The reception accorded Utah and her representatives was all that the most exacting citizen could demand, and to me it is only a slight indication of the interest that will be taken in the Utah exhibit at the World's Fair next year.

Immediately after the close of the exercises I devoted all of my time and attention to matters of business in relation to the construction of our building and the arrangement of our exhibit in the several departments.

THE UTAH BUILDING

is well under way. The frame is up, the sheeting for the staff covering all on, and the roof and skylight completed, so that it may be said to be inclosed. The modeling for the staff work is well advanced, and as the moulding and placing the staff on the building is a matter of small importance in comparison to the modelling, I think I am safe in saying that the building is more than half completed. The contractor assured me that he could complete the building in thirty days, if desired, and in view of the near approach of winter I gave directions for crowding the work until the building is completed. I am well satisfied with the arrangements and general appearance of our building. It compares favorably with the buildings of other states located in the same neighborhood, both in size and architectural beauty, and I am pleased to state that all of the Utah people who visited the grounds were well satisfied with the Utah building.

In regard to the purchase of show cases and the installation of our exhibit in the several buildings, I will say that I met with a number of contractors and manufacturers and, while I considered a number of designs and bids, I did not award the contract, but I directed the secretary to have two of the firms submit propositions to the commission at once, when we can decide between them or reject all propositions and try again.

WHAT SHOULD BE DONE.

All things considered, I think we should concentrate efforts on the mining, agricultural, manufacturing, liberal arts and educational departments, not, however, neglecting the other departments, but in view of the fact that we can excel in these departments, I think that we should devote most of our energy to the things we can do to the best advantage.

After consulting with the chiefs of departments and with other state officials, I am decidedly of the opinion that we should make our principal exhibit in the department buildings and such exhibit as we make in our own building to be mostly of a decorative character.

I make this recommendation after the most careful investigation and in inquiry possible, and find that not only the chiefs of departments at Chicago advise this course but the officials of other states and territories have come to the same conclusion.

The exhibits if placed in the department buildings will be properly catalogued and duly recognized by the exposition in an official way and will be competitive. Exhibits in the state buildings will not be catalogued nor will the state be allowed to catalogue them, and again thousands of visitors will view the exhibits in the general building where one will see them in the state buildings. While exhibits in the state buildings enter into competition for prizes this fact is only a minor reason for making our exhibits there.

PROMINENT POSITIONS DESIRABLE.

The principal reason is that we are reviewed by the people of the entire world and as we are endeavoring to advertise our resources it is my opinion that we should occupy the most prominent position possible.

People who are attracted by our exhibit in the main building will visit the Utah building for information in detail and can obtain it through general and county exhibits there installed and through the bureau of information.

A limited number of show cases should be placed in the Utah building and some choice exhibits placed therein. The building should be handsomely decorated and neatly furnished and used as a general headquarters building or club house as some of the states have designated their buildings.

The secretary must be in constant attendance at the Utah building prepared at all times to receive visitors and see that every courtesy possible is shown them and any information desired promptly supplied.

THE LADY MANAGERS.

The board of lady managers for Utah should have their headquarters at the Utah building.

The Utah building will be the headquarters of all Utah visitors where they can go and feel at home, and it should be the duty of the secretary to see that Utah visitors are supplied with information regarding the most attractive places to visit, and care for their mail, keep a record and register appointments so that friends can meet each other, in fact the secretary and his assistants must be constantly on the lookout to see that Utah people are well cared for.

The executive commissioner, under the direction of the commission, should have exclusive control of the arrangement of exhibits at Chicago, and he must determine how, when and where all exhibits are to be arranged. Our entire exhibit should be collected together in this city, and after it has been thoroughly examined, it should be the very best things selected, it should be forwarded to Chicago where the executive commissioner must take charge and see that each article is properly installed in its proper place.

A number of matters of minor importance, such as sewerage, water, plumbing, grading, insuring, etc., being matters of detail, I directed the secretary to attend to and report to the commission.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

In conclusion I wish to make the following recommendations, viz:

That the Utah exhibit proper in all departments be installed in the department buildings at Chicago.

That such specimens or exhibits as are placed in the Utah building be merely of a decorative character, yet at the same time show as nearly as possible in a concise and compact form all of our varied resources.

That the installation and arrangement of the Utah exhibit at Chicago be placed entirely in the hands of the executive commissioner.

That a limited number of cases be placed in the Utah building, and all specimens or exhibits be placed therein, except such articles as may be collected, by the ladies in the way of furniture or decorations.

That booth, or pavilions to be provided for the mining and agricultural buildings for the purpose of accentuating our exhibit and that show cases of suitable design be provided for the general exhibits from this Territory in all the departments. Under the rules of the Exposition the exhibits in the manufacturing departments, but must be placed in the class to which they belong regardless of where they come from, thus woolen goods go in one group, boots and shoes in another, etc. For this reason no booths will be allowed in this department.

That the commission provide for the transportation and installation of all accepted exhibits from the Territory and that private exhibits be transported to Chicago free of charge to the exhibitor.

That the general exhibit from this Territory be forwarded to Chicago not later than March 1, 1893, and that the executive commissioner and secretary open their offices in the Utah building on that date and give their personal attention to the reception and installation of exhibits so that everything shall be in readiness for the opening of the Exposition on or before May 1, 1893.

R. MACINTOSH, Vice President.

SALT LAKE CITY, Nov. 1, 1892.

THE BOARD OF EDUCATION.

The regular meeting of the Board of Education was held Thursday evening, November 3rd, 1892, Vice-President Nelson presided. There were likewise present Trustees Duke, Dooly, Baldwin, Newman, Alf, Pratt and Raybould.

A PRINTING CONTRACT.

A communication was filed from the Ackerman Printing company to the effect that their contract called for $1.10 per page, instead of $1. The delay in payment for same is putting them to some inconvenience, and they wanted their money.

Mr. Baldwin moved that the company be paid at the rate of $1 per page on account.

Mr. Pratt proposed to amend by signing a contract for printing said reports at the rate of $1 per page.

Mr. Duke moved to amend by authorizing the finance committee to pay for the same when the contract was made.

The motion as amended was carried unanimously.

FOR SURVEYING.

The city engineering department sent in three bills amounting to $43.25 for surveying school sites. Referred to the committee on sites and buildings.

PLUMBING.

The following was received from Health Commissioner Beatty:

Board of Education:

Gentlemen:—On or about October 13th, the plumbing inspector visited the Fourteenth school house for the purpose of examining the plumbing therein. He reports the same as being in a sanitary condition. The only fault found with the water closets in the basement was the insufficient supply of water for flushing purposes. I referred the inspector's report to Mr. Ryan, superintendent of the waterworks. Mr. Ryan stated that the supply of water was too small for so many closets and basins as are in the building, and that if the school board would apply to him for another service the same would be granted, thus avoiding further annoyance in this particular in the future.

The matter was referred to the committee on sites and buildings.

WANT TO BE JANITORS.

Stephen M. Theobald applied for a position as janitor. Henry Waters also applied. Referred to the committee on furniture and supplies.

Williams & Van Cott, attorneys to the board, sent the following:

Board of Education:

Gentlemen:—We have examined the matter referred to us by your finance committee relative to the tax suits involving the school taxes of 1890 levied in the several districts into which the Salt Lake City district was formerly divided, and we have come to the conclusion that the board of education is not entitled to any further relief in the district court, for the reason that the judgment of the Supreme court, determining that those taxes were invalid, was a final judgment and determined that the board of education was not entitled to have the same or any portion thereof paid over to it by the collector. It seems that in the further proceedings taken for the disposition of the fund paid into the court by refunding it less certain expenses, to those that should be ascertained to have paid it in to the collector, the report of the referee and direction of the court to make such distribution includes and specifies certain persons amongst whom we understand is Mr. Dooly and some others who never participated in the prosecution, authorized any one to appear for them or accepted the results of the litigation and that their taxes remain in the hands of the district clerk. It seems to us that those persons' whose money are so situated have a right to be heard by an application made on their behalf, but as the decision determines that the board has no interest in the fund, we are of the opinion no relief could be had upon its application.

Respectfully,

WILLIAMS & VAN COTT.

Filed for information.

SCHOOL TAX FEES.

The following was also received from the same parties:

SALT LAKE CITY, Nov. 2, 1892.

Board of Education:

In reference to the litigation involving the school taxes for the year 1890, and which was determined by the judges of the Supreme Court of the Territory adversely to the board of education, certain costs were taxed against the board, and judgment for the amounts entered in the respective cases. These costs are due the clerk and other officials of the court. We think the bills for the payment were recommended. Our attention has today been called to the fact by the clerk of the district court that the amounts have not yet been paid. We beg to call your attention to the matter again and recommend their payment, as we know of no reason for refusing to pay the same.

WILLIAMS & VAN COTT.

Mr. Nelson said that already nearly $4000 had been taken as fees from the sum paid into court. Of this sum the clerk as receiver, and Collector Hardy as referee, received something like $700; the attorneys received the remainder.

After some discussion the whole matter was ordered to "lay on the table."

A COMMITTEE'S RECOMMENDATIONS.

The committee on sites and buildings recommended that the attic of the Hamilton school be floored with surfaced lumber. The contractors, Coxford Bros. & Bryan, offer to floor the attic for $285.

The committee reported that they had advertised for bids for moving dirt from the Lowell school grounds in the Twentieth ward to the Lincoln and Franklin school grounds in the Sixth and Fifteenth wards. The highest bid was $1800 and the lowest, Stout & Drage, $1450. The committee have instructed the clerk to make a contract with Messrs. Stout & Drage for $1450 in accordance with the previous resolution of the board, and ask that their action be approved.

The report was passed.

BRYANT SCHOOL.

The committee on sites and buildings reported that at the time of letting the contract for the erection of the Bryant school, they intended to use the dry cremation closets, but learning soon afterward that the city contemplated the construction of sewer laterals eastward to Eighth East they considered it advisable that water closets be substituted. Messrs. Heesch, Davis & Co. are doing the plumbing and the committee recommended that their bid to put in all the piping necessary for a first-class system of water-works to be connected with the sewer for the sum of $622, be accepted. The item "water closets" was not included in the contract for the erection of the building.

Report adopted.

OQUIRH SCHOOL.

The committee on sites and buildings requested that they be authorized to advertise for bids for excavating, foundation, stonework, brickwork, plumbing and carpenter work and finishing of the Oquirrh school; that bids be received separately and reported separately and in the aggregate to this board.

This report was also adopted.

HAMILTON SCHOOL.

The committee on sites and buildings ask authority to enter into a contract for putting in all the necessary piping and water closets in the Hamilton school building. This building, like the Bryant, was intended to have only cremating closets, but the cost of changing the flues for the cremating system was found to be so great that the board decided to put in steam and water closets. The cost for the work now contemplated will be about $450.

Report adopted.

WANTED HALF PAY.

The committee on teachers, to whom was referred the communication of Mrs. Webster, principal of the Twentieth ward school asking for half pay while unable to pursue her duties, reported, recommending that she be allowed one week's salary as per rule of the board. Report adopted.

AT $75 PER MONTH.

The committee on teachers recommended the appointment of Mrs. Hamer to a position in the primary department of the Eleventh school at a salary of $75 per month. Adopted.

BOOKS FOR SCHOOL USE.

The committee on school work recommended the purchase of certain French and German classics needed in the high school, at an expense of about $20; also one Lang's and one Greek dictionary and one large classical atlas for use in the high school, also that the meter and gas be conducted into the laboratory, which can be done at a very small expense.

The committee also recommended that all school books be distributed from the office of the board and that no books be passed from one school to another without passing through the office.

The report was passed.

LINCOLN SCHOOL.

The committee on furniture and supplies reported that the Lincoln school in the Sixth ward is fast nearing completion and requires the attention of a janitor. They recommended for the position James Morrow, at a salary of $90 per month, he to take entire charge of the buildings, grounds and steam plant. The building superintendent reports that he will commence hauling the earth from the Twentieth ward site on November 4th and the person recommended is thoroughly qualified to receive it and can be used profitably in this manner until the building is ready for use.

Report adopted.

BOND BIDS.

The finance committee reported that they had advertised for bids for the remaining $150,000 school bonds.

RETURNED ELDERS.

Elder Timothy Mets of Mesa, Arizona, called at the News office this afternoon, having just returned from a mission to the Netherlands and Belgium, over which he acted as preaching officer while there. He reports the mission in those countries in a promising condition.

Elder Mets was affected with very poor health during his absence and is glad to get home again. He returns in good spirits and will visit friends in this city and various towns in northern Utah until about the 10th of December, when he expects to leave for Arizona.

Elder James H. Anderson, who has just returned from England after two years' absence, made a welcome call at the News office this afternoon. Brother Anderson has been engaged on the editorial staff of the Millennium Star during the entire period named, and in addition to his journalistic labors has done considerable editorial work. As an old and faithful employee of the Deseret News, his former associates were delighted to welcome him back again into their midst.

Brother Anderson comes home in good health, with the exception of a severe cold contracted during his homeward journey. He is looking first-rate.

DECISION IN THE CHURCH CASES.

The adjourned session of the June term of the Territorial Supreme court was held this morning in the Supreme court room, Dooly building. Chief Justice Zane presided, and there were with him on the bench Associate Justices Blackburn and Miner. The members of the bar gathered in strong force. Judge Anderson occupied a seat among his legal brethren, those present including Attorneys F. S. Richards, W. H. Dickson, Judge Henderson, Judge Juul, Judge Sutherland, Judge Loofbourow, Arthur Brown, E. W. Tatlock, C. S. Varian, Jno. M. Zane, Ogden Hiles, Judge Bennett, Judge J. A. Marshall, Barlow Ferguson, E. B. Critchlow, W. C. Reilly, J. A. Williams, S. P. Armstrong.

The minutes of the last session of court were read by Clerk Bache and signed, after which Chief Justice Zane delivered the following anxiously awaited opinion in

THE CHURCH CASES:

The late corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and others, defendants, vs. the United States of America, plaintiff.

We are now called upon to designate the objects to which the personal property in the hands of the receiver shall be devoted, and to decide upon the mode of its application.

The questions presented for our decision require an examination of the Master's report, and the interpretation of congressional enactments designed to suppress polygamy, as well as an application of the doctrine of equity applicable to the rights of property dedicated to charitable uses.

This suit is maintained under Sec. 17 of an act in force March 3rd, 1887, and is as follows:

"That the acts of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, incorporating, continuing, or providing for the corporation known as the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and the ordinance of the so-called general assembly of the State of Deseret incorporating the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, so far as the same may now have legal force and validity, are hereby disapproved and annulled, and the said corporation, in so far as it may have or pretend to have, any legal existence, is hereby dissolved. That it shall be the duty of the attorney general of the United States to cause such proceeding to be taken in the Supreme court of the Territory of Utah as shall be proper to execute the foregoing provisions of this section and to wind up the affairs of said corporation conformably to law; and in such proceedings the court shall have power, and it shall be its duty, to make such decree or decrees as shall be proper to effectuate the transfer of the title to real property now held and used by said corporation for places of worship, and parsonages connected therewith, and burial grounds, and of the description mentioned in the proviso to section thirteen of this act and in section twenty-six of this act, to the respective trustees mentioned in section twenty-six of this act; and for the purposes of this section said court shall have all the powers of a court of equity." Section thirteen referred to in the section quoted made it "the duty of the attorney general of the United States to institute and prosecute proceedings to forfeit and escheat to the United States the property of corporations obtained or held in violation of section three of the act of Congress approved July 1st, 1862, entitled 'An act to punish and prevent the practice of polygamy in the territories.'" This section also declared that such property so forfeited and escheated should be disposed of by the secretary of the interior and the proceeds thereof applied to the benefit of the common schools in the Territory in which such property might be, and provided that no building, or the grounds appurtenant thereto, held and occupied exclusively in which to worship God, or parsonages connected therewith or burial grounds should be forfeited. And section 3 above mentioned declared that it should not be lawful for any corporation or association for religious or charitable purposes to acquire or hold real estate in any territory of a greater value than $50,000, and that all real estate acquired or held by any such corporation or association contrary to the provisions of the act should be forfeited and escheated to the United States.

Section 26, also referred to in section 17, is as follows:

"That all religious societies, sects and congregations shall have the right to have and to hold, through trustees appointed by any court exercising probate powers in a Territory, only on the nomination of the authorities of such society, sect or congregation, so much real property for the erection or use of houses of worship, and for such parsonages and burial grounds as shall be necessary for the convenience and use of the several congregations of such religious society, sect or congregation."

These acts provide that all real estate held by any church for religious or charitable purposes not used for houses of worship, parsonage or burial grounds, acquired contrary to the act of 1862, shall be forfeited and escheated to the United States.

And they annul the charter of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and provide for winding up its affairs and for the transfer of its real property not forfeited and escheated, to trustees appointed by the probate court on the nomination of the authorities of such church.

In these enactments Congress recognized the religion of the Latter-day Saints as lawful and their church though disincorporated as having the right through trustees selected by its authorities to own houses in which to worship God and for their ministers to live in. In the second section of the act of 1862 it is declared that it shall be so construed as not to affect or interfere with "the right to worship God according to the dictates of conscience."

Upon a hearing of this case on the bill, answer, evidence and stipulation of the parties, this court held the various sections above mentioned, and the acts referred to, valid and appointed a receiver to take possession of all real and personal property of the defunct corporation and to hold the same to be disposed of according to law, and upon a further and subsequent hearing the court made a further decree by which it set apart to the disincorporated body of religious worshippers, block eighty-seven in plat "A" Salt Lake City, known as the "Temple Block" and held the remainder of real estate acquired in violation of the 3rd section of the act of 1862 subject to forfeiture and escheat to the United States. That the personal property of the Church, by reason of the dissolution of its corporation because of the failure or illegality of the trust to which it had been dedicated at its acquisition and in consequence of its use by the corporation in operation of law became forfeited and escheated to the United States. From this decree the defendant and the intervenors, George Romney and others on behalf of themselves and all other members of the late corporation appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. The latter court affirmed the decree appealed from except the part relating to the personal property; and held that the personal property could not be appropriated to the purpose to which it had been dedicated because the same was, in whole, or in part, contrary to law or opposed to public policy; that there did not exist any person or persons, natural or legal, legally entitled to any portion of it as successors in interest to the Church, and that it had devolved on the United States, and not being lawfully applicable to the purposes to which it was originally dedicated or for which it had been acquired, and to which at the commencement of this suit it was being devoted by the corporation and its controlling authorities, the same ought to be limited and appointed to such charitable uses, lawful in their character, as should most nearly correspond to those to which it was originally destined, to be ascertained and defined * * * by reference to a master for examination, enquiry and report thereon, subject to the approval of the court, and to be established, administered and carried out in such manner and according to such scheme as may be approved by the court."

The case was remanded to this court with directions to modify its decree as above directed "and to take run further proceedings as to law and justice may appertain in conformity with the opinion."

In conformity with this opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States and its decree, this case was referred to the Master. And two schemes were presented to him. One by the defendant's solicitors proposing to vest such personal property in the First Presidency of the Church, in trust for the relief and assistance of its poor members needing pecuniary aid, and for the erection, repair and maintenance of houses of worship of people of that faith and limiting the use to these two purposes.

The other scheme proposed by the solicitors of the United States would vest this property in a commissioner appointed by the court to be used by him for the benefit of the public schools of the Territory.

The Master has reported this last plan and recommended its approval by the court. To which the defendant's solicitors object and intend to "approve their scheme, and plaintiff's solicitors insist upon the one recommended by the Master.

Behind the legal title to the funds in controversy in the late corporation, its beneficial rights belonging to natural persons. Out of the confidence reposed in the church officials who controlled them, an obligation that they would faithfully apply these funds according to the general understanding of their contributors. The Supreme Court of the United States in its opinion directing these proceedings said: "The property in question has been dedicated to public and charitable uses. It matters not whether it is the product of private contributions made during the course of half a century, or of taxes imposed upon the people or of gains arising from fortunate operations in business or appreciation in value; the charitable uses for which it is held are stamped upon it by charter, by ordinance, by regulation and by usage in such an indelible manner that there can be no mistake as to their character, purpose or object."

Mormon Church vs. United States, 186 U. S. p. 50.

In its opinion the court does not distinguish and consider singly and separately the various charitable objects to which the property in controversy was dedicated. In fact the inquiry by the trial court had not gone that far; they were considered in a lump (so to speak) and the whole lump appears to have been regarded as tainted with polygamy. The court, on appeal, could not look at the merits of each object of charity separately, because the findings of the evidence did not disclose the object singly or their peculiar merits.

"In his inquiry the Master advanced, and we are permitted to see the objects to which the fund had been devoted. In the light of the evidence reported by him we can distinguish the good from the bad, the worthy from the unworthy, and understand to which, and in what proportions the Church authorities had applied the fund before it was taken out of their hands.

It appears from the evidence reported by the Master that George Q. Cannon testified, "That he was first counselor to Wilford Woodruff, President of the Church, and that he was familiar with the purposes for which contributions creating the fund were made for many years; that they were voluntarily made for religious and charitable purposes; that appropriation and distribution of it was left to the First Presidency, and the proceeds were expended on temples and places of worship and for the poor and such charitable objects as arose; that the First Presidency in their appropriations of this fund were limited to Church purposes; that the custom has been for the First Presidency to submit to the semi-annual conference of the Church a report showing the appropriations and their purposes, and such reports were approved by that body." This testimony was corroborated by the testimony of other officers of the Church and there was no evidence contradicting it.

The Master in his report states that the "allegations that ever since the organization of the Church and down to the time when the fund was taken possession of by the receiver herein, the fund has been managed, controlled and disbursed by and under the direction of the First Presidency of the Church, and was devoted and applied solely to the religious and charitable uses in which the Church and the members thereof were interested; that much the larger part of the fund had prior to March 3rd, 1887, been devoted to the building of temples, meeting houses and other places of worship for the members of the Church and for the relief of its poor and distressed members, their families, and to the widows and orphans of such members who were in needy and distressed circumstances, were in the main supported by the evidence adduced before him."

It also appears from the testimony that about $75,000 per annum had been appropriated out of this fund to assist the poor previous to the time it was placed in the hands of the receiver, and about $50,000 per annum to the erection and repair of places of worship, and that as much will be required in the future.

The money and personal property in the hands of the receiver and to be disposed of by the court is about $400,000. The money donated to assist and relieve the poor and erect places of worship and maintain and repair them are for charitable uses.

The St. of 43 Ellis, c. 4, is regarded as the highest standard by which to determine charitable uses and purposes.

Among the objects mentioned in that act as charitable is "relief for the aged, impotent and poor people;" donations for "schools of learning, free schools, repair of churches;" and for "aid or ease of any poor inhabitants;" and for "house of correction;" many other purposes and objects are mentioned as charitable in this statute.

The statute has been liberally construed by the courts.

In the case of Jackson vs. Phillips and others, 14 Allen, 554, the court said: "Charities are not confined at the present day to those which were permitted by law in England in the reign of Elizabeth. A gift for the advancement of religion or other charitable purpose in a manner permitted by existing laws is not the less valid by reason of having such an object as would not have been legal at the time of the passage of the Statute of Charitable Uses. For example, charitable trusts for dissenters from the established church have been uniformly upheld in England since the Toleration Act of 1 W. & M. c. 18, removed the legal disabilities under which such sects previously labored."

Attorney General vs. Hickman, 2 Eq. Cas. Ab. 193.

Lloyd vs. Spillet, 3 P. W. 344.

Attorney General vs. Cock, 2 Ves. Sen. 278.

And in this country since the Revolution no distinction has been made between charitable gifts for the benefit of different religious sects."

While the Master finds in substance that the fund was devoted and applied by the Church solely to the religious uses of the Church, and much the larger part of it to places of worship for its members, and to the relief of its poor and distressed members and their families and to widows and orphans of such members in needy and distressed circumstances, he reached the conclusion "That all the uses to which this property had been applied rested under the condemnation of the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States; that it had been adjudged that the property cannot go back to any of such uses." If this conclusion as to the effect of that decree is correct, then the scheme proposed by which the fund would be devoted alone to assist poor, distressed and needy members of the Church, its widows and orphans and to aid in the construction and repair of its houses of worship must be denied.

The court having found in its decree that the uses and purposes to which the fund in question had been dedicated were in whole or in part opposed to public policy, good morals and contrary to the laws of the United States, said:

"And not being lawfully applicable to the purposes for which it was originally dedicated or acquired and to which at the commencement of this suit it was being devoted by the corporation and its controlling authorities the same ought to be limited and appointed to such charitable uses, lawful in their character, as most nearly correspond to those to which it was originally destined.

The court did not mean to say that the assistance of the poor and distressed members of the Church, and aid and comfort to the widows and orphans of its members were opposed to public policy, good morals and contrary to the laws of the United States.

The decree concludes: "Wherefore it is * * * decreed that the cause be remanded to the Supreme court of the Territory of Utah, with directions to modify its decree as herein directed, and to take such further proceedings as to law and justice may appertain in conformity with the opinion of this court."

Mormon Church vs. United States, 140 U. S. 865.

This decree must be construed in the light of the opinion of the court ordering and making the decree.

138 U. S. 50.

The court used the following language in its opinion:

"But it also stated in the findings of fact, and is a matter of public notoriety, that the religious uses intended to be subserved and promoted are the inculcation and spread of the doctrines and usages of the Mormon Church, one of the distinguishing features of which is the practice of polygamy—a crime against the laws and abhorrent to the sentiments and feelings of the civilized world." And after stating that the Church in defiance of law was persevering in propagating this doctrine, and condemning it in unmistakable language the court continued, "The question therefore is whether, the promotion of such a nefarious system and practice, so repugnant to our laws and to the principles of our civilization is to be allowed to continue by sanction of the government itself; and whether the funds accumulated for that purpose shall be restored to the same unlawful uses as heretofore, to the detriment of the true interests of civil society."

In substance the court said that the fund was used to promote and spread the doctrines and usages of the Church, one of the distinguishing features of which was the practice of polygamy, and that to return to the authorities of the Church or to Romney and others, intervenors, on behalf of all its unincorporated members as they asked to be appropriated and used without limitation, would be in effect to sanction such unlawful use of the fund for the same unlawful purpose—the propagation of polygamy.

It understood that this fund was used to propagate and spread the doctrines and usages of the church and that polygamy was one of those doctrines and its practice was one of its usages; the court did not undertake to distinguish the lawful purposes of the church from the one that was unlawful. It was not asked by the parties, or either of them, to do that.

Referring to the law of March 3rd, 1857, the court said: "The only question we have to consider in this regard is as to the constitutional power of congress to pass it. Nor are we now called upon to declare what disposition ought to be made of the property of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

This suit is in some respects a auxiliary one, instituted for the purpose of taking possession of and holding for final disposition the property of the defunct corporation in the hands of a receiver and winding up its affairs. To that extent and to that only the decree of the Supreme Court of the Territory has gone."

The opinion concludes: "The application of Romney and others representing the unincorporated members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, is fully disposed of by the considerations already adduced. The principal question discussed has been, whether the property of the Church was in such a condition as to authorize the government and the court to take possession of it and hold it until it shall be seen what final disposition of it should be made; and we think it was in such a condition, and that it is properly held in the custody of the receiver.

The rights of the Church members will necessarily be taken into consideration in the final disposition of the case. There is no ground for granting their present application. The property is in the custody of the law, awaiting the judgment of the court as to its final disposition in view of the illegal uses to which it is subject in the hands of the Church of Latter-day Saints, whether incorporated or unincorporated. The conditions for claiming possession of it by members of the sect or community under the act do not at present exist."

The court held that it was not then called upon to declare what disposition ought to be made of the fund; that the principal question considered by it was whether the property of the church was in such a condition as to authorize the court to take possession of it by its receiver and hold it until it should be seen what final disposition should be made of it; that the property was in the custody of the law awaiting final disposition by the court in view of the illegal uses to which it was subject in the hands of the church authorities—whether incorporated or unincorporated; that the conditions for claiming possession of it by the members of the Mormon sect or community did not then exist; that their rights would necessarily be taken into consideration in the final disposition of the case; and that there was no ground for granting their application as then made and at that time.

In this there is nothing to indicate that the court understood that the rights of the unincorporated members of the Church were barred by its decree. In fact the court expressly said that their rights would necessarily be taken into consideration in the final disposition of the case—rights determined by the decree could not be taken into consideration afterwards. The case was remanded and the Territorial court was directed to refer the questions as to the rights of the Church and its members and all others to the fund to a Master for examination and inquiry as to their rights under the conditions existing at the time of the inquiry and for the suggestion of a scheme or mode by which it could be "limited and appointed to such charitable uses, lawful in their character, as might most nearly correspond to those to which it was originally destined."

We cannot concur in the conclusion of the Master that the Supreme court in its decree condemned all the uses to which the fund had been dedicated, and that it forbids the application of any part of it to any of them. It appears from the opinion that polygamy was the only object that the court found to be unlawful, and we cannot believe that it intended to condemn all the worthy purposes of the Church because of this unlawful one. Did the virus of this permeate every charitable purpose of the Mormon people? One of the charities to which this fund was appropriated was the assistance and relief of the poor of the Church, another was the erection and repair of houses of worship. The decree cannot be construed to condemn those purposes—to condemn those qualities as vicious in the Latter-day Saints that we regard as virtues in other people.

We are of the opinion that the decree of the Supreme court of the United States in this cause does not forbid us from limiting and appointing this fund to a charitable use that is lawful within the scope of the purpose to which it was originally dedicated.

We will now consider the two schemes presented for our consideration and adoption. Neither of them is unlawful or opposed to public policy or morality.

The scheme that would devote the fund to the aid and assistance of the poor members of the Church and their families and to the erection and repair of its places of worship would limit it to objects within the scope of the intentions of its donors.

The other would devote and appoint it to a use not intended by its donors and to which it was not dedicated.

This brings us to the question, can the court appropriate this fund to a charitable object not intended by its contributors and to which it had not been dedicated?

The court said in its opinion remanding this case, "It is obvious that any property of the corporation which may be adjudged to be forfeited and escheated will be subject to a more absolute control and disposition by the government than that which is not so forfeited. The non-forfeited property will be subject to such disposition only as may be required by the law of charitable uses, while the forfeited and escheated property, being subject to a more absolute control of the government, will admit of a greater latitude of discretion in regard to its disposition."

The legal title and all equitable rights to the real estate forfeited and escheated, because held contrary to the law of 1862, vests in the government to be dealt with and disposed of according to law. While the personal property cannot be so forfeited and escheated and it must be disposed of according to the law of charities. While the decree gave the possession and custody of the personal property to the receiver to be held subject to the further order of the court, the use was to charitable objects, lawful in their character, within the general intent of the donors. The opinion does not say that the control over the personal property is absolute; that it was regardless of the purposes of its dedication. The court further said in the same opinion:

"The principles of the law of charities are not confined to a particular people or nation but prevail in all civilized countries pervaded by the spirit of Christianity. * * *

A leading and prominent principle prevailing in them all is that property devoted to a charitable and worthy object, promotive of the public good, shall be applied to the purpose of its dedication, and protected from spoliation and from diversion to other objects. Though devoted to a particular use it is considered as given to the public, and is therefore taken under the guardianship of the law. If it cannot be applied to the particular use for which it was intended, either because the objects to be served have failed, or because they have become unlawful and repugnant to the public policy of the State it will be applied to some object of kindred character so as to fulfill in substance if not in manner and form the purpose of its consecration."

In illustration of the application of the principle, the court quotes from the opinion of Lord Chief Justice Wilmot, in his opinion in Attorney General vs. Lady Downing, 1 Wilmot, 32: "But where property is given to mistaken charitable uses this court distinguishes between the charity and the use; and setting the charitable bequest in the intention of the testator they execute the intention varying the use as the king who is the curator of all charities, and the constitutional trustee for the performance of them, please to direct and appoint."

In this it is not stated that a of equity in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction could vary the use to objects outside of the intention of the donor; but it does say "varying the use as the king pleases to direct and appoint." And after citing cases from various countries, many from England and our own land, in illustration of the doctrine of cy pres, the court continues, "The true ground is that the property given to a charity becomes in a measure public property, only applicable as far as may be it is true, to the specific purposes to which it is devoted. * * *

Hence when such property ceases to have any other owner by the failure of the trustees, by forfeiture for illegal application or for any other cause, the ownership naturally and necessarily falls upon the sovereign power of the state; and thereupon the court of chancery, in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction, will appoint a new trustee to take the place of the trustees that have failed or that have been set aside, and will give directions for the further management and administration of the property; or if the case is beyond the ordinary jurisdiction of the court the legislature may interpose and make such disposition of the matter as will accord with the purposes of justice and right. The funds are not lost to the public as charity funds; they are not lost to the general objects or class of objects which they were intended to subserve or effect."

In this the court says that when such property ceases to have any other owner by the failure of the trustees for any cause, the court of Chancery in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction will appoint new trustees; or if the case is beyond the ordinary jurisdiction of the court, the legislature may interpose and make such disposition of the matter as will accord with the purposes of justice and right.

If a person holding the legal title of property, for the use of another, or others, refuses to discharge the obligation arising out of the confidence reposed in him to apply it according to the trust, or if he forfeits his right to do so for any cause, the court in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction will appoint another trustee. This jurisdiction, termed ordinary jurisdiction is confined to the selection of the instrument to apply the property to the object; it does not extend to the selection of a new object to which to apply the funds.

The ordinary jurisdiction is here limited to the mode; but if the case is beyond that the opinion says the legislature may interpose to prevent the funds from being lost to the general objects or class of objects which they were intended to subserve, and in so doing may make such disposition of the matter as will accord with justice and right.

In the opinion from which we have been quoting the court defined the powers of the government to deal with the real estate forfeited and escheated to it, and also its authority with respect to the property not so forfeited and escheated. The court also disclaimed the power of the government through its courts of equity in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction and its authority through the sovereign in monarchical governments, and also its authority as expressed in enactments of the law making department in a republic.

It requires a careful examination of the opinion to distinguish the powers held to be applicable to the forfeited and escheated property from those applying to the property not forfeited and escheated, and also to distinguish the powers held to pertain to the court in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction with respect to property dedicated to charitable uses, from those belonging to the sovereign in a monarchy with respect to such property or to the law-making department in a government based upon the will of the people—one in which they are sovereign.

In Jackson vs. Phillips and others, 14 Allen, 539, a testator "bequeathed the same to trustees; one for the preparation and circulation of books, newspapers, the delivery of speeches, and such other means as in their judgment" would "create a public sentiment," as would "put an end to negro slavery in this country," and the other for the benefit of "fugitive slaves" who might "escape from slave holding states." After his death slavery was abolished by the thirteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States. Held "that these charitable bequests should be applied to carry out the intentions of the testator as nearly as possible, according to a scheme to be settled by a master and approved by the court." The master reported that "both sums should be paid over to the trustees, the first to be paid by them from time to time to an association already established to promote the education, support and interest of the freedmen, lately slaves in those states in which slavery had been so abolished; and the second sum (being of small amount) to the use of necessitous persons of African descent in the City of Boston and its vicinity, preference being given to such as had escaped from slavery."

The purpose of the first bequest was the liberation of negro slaves, and the purpose of the second was to assist such as might escape from slave holding states. The general purpose was aid to negro slaves. And these slaves having been liberated, the court held that the sum should be devoted to their use and benefit as freedmen, except a small portion to be used for the benefit of necessitous persons of the same race in Boston and its vicinity. While the mode prescribed by the testator for benefiting the negro slave by securing their liberation and by aiding those who had escaped from slavery was necessarily abandoned, the general object of the bequest was not. The court devoted it to their use as freedmen and to needy persons of the same race in a particular locality.

In this decision, the court went to the verge of its jurisdiction. In the same opinion the court said, "This power of disposition by the sign manual of the crown in direct opposition to the declared intention of the testator, whether it is to be deemed to have belonged to the king as head of the church as well as of the state, intrusted and empowered to see that nothing be done to the dishonor of the crown or the propagation of a false religion; Rex vs. Portington, 1 Salt, 162; 8 C. 1 Eq. Cas. Ab. 98; or to have been derived from the power exercised by the Roman emperor, who was sovereign legislator as well as supreme interpreter of the laws; Dig. 83, 2, 17; 50, 8, 4; Code, lib. 1, tit. 2, c. 19; tit. 14, c. 12; is clearly a prerogative and not a judicial power, and could not be exercised by this court; and it is difficult to see how it could be held to exist at all in a republic, in which charitable bequests have never been forfeited to the use or submitted to the disposition of the government, because unconstitutional; Legal, 4 Dane Ab. 239. Gard vs. White, 2 Dana 176. Methodist Church vs. Remington, 1 Watts, 228."

In the same opinion the court said further: "It is accordingly well settled by decisions of the highest authority, that when a gift is made to trustees for a charitable purpose, the general nature of which is pointed out, and which is lawful and valid at the time of the death of the testator, and no intention is expressed to limit it to a particular institution or mode of application, and afterwards either by change of circumstances the scheme of the testator becomes impracticable, or by change of law becomes illegal, the fund, having once vested in charity, does not go to the heirs at law as a resulting trust, but is to be applied by the court of chancery, in the exercise of its jurisdiction in equity, as near the testator's particular directions as possible, to carry out his general charitable intent."

The court expressly said that when the gift is for a charitable purpose the general nature of which is pointed out, and no intention is expressed to limit it to a particular institution or mode of application and afterwards the scheme of the testator becomes impracticable or illegal, the fund must be applied by the court as near the testator's particular direction as possible to carry out his general charitable intent. The court cannot select any object of charity outside the scope of the general intent.

The doctrine of cy pres is only a liberal rule of construction to ascertain the intention of the donor, and all the rules relating thereto are intended to aid in ascertaining and carrying out as nearly as may be the true intention of the donor. His intention should be the aim of the court.

"The difference between the crown and the court is this: The court is governed by known judicial rules of interpretation; the crown is governed by its own good will and pleasure in deducing or imparting such intentions as it sees fit. 2 Perry on Trusts, Sec 727.

In discussing the doctrine of cy pres in its opinion in the case of Moore's Heirs vs. Moore's Devises, 4 Dana, 354, after referring to the prerogative of the king as patria potestas as to gifts to charitable use, the court said: "And this regal prerogative, with some other curative powers inherent in the crown, was delegated to the Chancellor of England in his ordinary ministerial capacity as the keeper of the great seal and official organ of the king." And then after remarking that we have no such officer in the United States as the Chancellor of England; that our chancery courts have no other jurisdiction than that of courts of equity and no other power than that which is judicial or regulated by law, said further that "We do not admit that the commonwealth, as patria potestas can rightfully interfere unless there be an abuse to her; and then she may become absolute and beneficial owner. Rights here are regulated by law." * * * "We are satisfied that the cy pres doctrine of England is not, or should not be, a judicial doctrine, except in one kind of case; and that is, where there is an available charity to an identified or ascertainable object, and a particular mode, inadequate, illegal or inappropriate, or which happens to fail, has been prescribed.

In such a case a court of equity may substitute or sanction any other mode that may be lawful and suitable as will effectuate the declared intention of the donor, and not arbitrarily and in the dark, presuming on his motives or wishes, declare an object for him. A court may act judicially as long as it effectuates the lawful intention of the donor. But it does not act judicially when it applies his bounty to a specific object of charity, selected by itself, merely because he had dedicated it to charity generally, or to a specified purpose which cannot be effectuated; for the court cannot know or decide that he would have been willing that it should be applied to the object to which the judge, in the plenitude of his unregulated discretion and peculiar benevolence has seen fit to decree its appropriation, whereby he, and not the donor, in effect and at last, creates the charity."

This doctrine was re-affirmed in Curline's Adm'x vs. Curline's Heirs, 8 Dana, 83, the court holding that property law dedicated by the donor to a certain charity could not be diverted or appointed by the court to any other object, and if property is devised in such general terms that it may be devoted to one or more of several charities it cannot be devoted by the court to any object not embraced in such general terms, and said that by doing so the court might apply the charity to an object which the donor did not intend it and to which he never would have devoted it. Gilman et al. vs. Hamilton et al., 16 Ill., 225, holds that the court cannot change the charity to any object not intended by the donor.

In City of Philadelphia vs. Girards Heirs, 45 P. St. R., the court said "In all gifts for charitable uses the law makes a very clear distinction between those parts of a writing conveying them, which declare that the gift and its purposes and those which direct the mode of its distribution."

In the same opinion the court further said, "And this is the doctrine of cy pres, so far as it has been expressly adopted by us. Not the doctrine 'grossly revolting to the public sense of justice' (1 Waite, 226) and 'carried to the extravagant length that it was formerly in England (17 S. & R. 93) by which an unlawful and entirely indefinite charity was transformed by the court or the crown into one that was lawful and definite, though not at all intended by the donor or testator. But a reasonable doctrine of which a well defined charity, or one where the means of definition are given, may be enforced in favor of the general intent, even where the mode or means provided by the donor fail by reason of their inadequacy or unlawfulness."

From these authorities we may deduce the general rule that courts of equity in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction cannot devote any portion of a fund dedicated to charitable uses to any object not contemplated by the donor; that when property is given to a class of objects in general terms and also directed to be applied to one of them in special terms, if its application to that one becomes unlawful or impracticable the doctrine of cy pres authorizes the court to devote it to one or more of those embraced in the general intent most analogous to the one specially named; that the general intent may not be expressed in explicit terms if the devise or dedication in the light of the circumstances authorizes the court to infer that such was the donor's wish in that event. The same rules apply when the charity is the result of contributions by a large number of people.

It is plain from the evidence before us that the members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints contributed the fund in dispute, expecting and wishing it to be applied by the First Presidency to Church purposes—to objects promoted by the Church.

We cannot find from the evidence before us that the Mormon people who contributed this fund intended or expected the fund or any part of it would be appropriated to the support of the common schools of the Territory. In common with non-Mormons the Latter-day Saints are taxed to maintain the public schools, and to take the money that they contributed for Church purposes and devoted also to their support would be unequal and unjust.

Were it simply a matter of discretion with us we would not be disposed to assume superior and peculiar wisdom and say to these people that we will devote the contributions made by you for Church purposes to a purpose that you did not intend it—to the support of the common schools, because we think that a more worthy object. We cannot adopt the scheme presented by the plaintiff and reported by the Master.

We will now consider the scheme for the application of this fund presented by the defendants. Their plan would vest this property in the First Presidency of the Church, now consisting of Wilford Woodruff, its President, and George Q. Cannon and Joseph F. Smith, its counselors, and their successors in office in trust, to apply the proceeds thereof and to limit its use to the relief and assistance of the poor of the Church, and to the building and repair of convenient and necessary places of worship for its members. It appears from the evidence before us that this fund was very largely applied to these two objects by the First Presidency prior to the time it was taken from their possession and control. But we are also authorized to infer that at the time this case was tried in 1858 and prior thereto the teachers of the Church and its missionaries taught of by its authority that the practice of polygamy was right, and that the Church in that way propagated it and that a portion of the property in dispute was used to aid and support such teachers and missionaries and in that way was applied to an immoral and unlawful end. The scheme under consideration, however, would forbid the use of this fund for any such purpose; it requires it to be used for the benefit of needy members and to be applied to the erection of houses of worship for the Latter-day Saints. The relief of the needy and distressed of whatever faith cannot be immoral or unlawful.

Nor can we say that the expenditure of money for the erection and repair of convenient and necessary houses of worship for the Mormon people is devoted to an immoral or unlawful purpose.

In the legislation of Congress with respect to polygamy, houses of worship, parsonages and burial grounds are reserved to the Church and the decision remanding this case affirms so much of the decree of the trial court as set such property apart to the Church.

We now come to another question—Can this court in the exercise of its ordinary chancery jurisdiction vest this fund in the First Presidency to be applied to the two purposes that we have seen are lawful? This property as the evidence shows was given to the church authorities named, to be applied to church purposes in their discretion. Assuming that a portion of it was so expended by such authorities as to propagate polygamy can the court now limit the proceeds of the entire fund to the relief of the poor and to the erection and repair of houses of worship—two lawful objects, and the one to which the larger portion of the fund had always been devoted.

We may presume that the contributors expected and intended that the First Presidency would apply their gifts to such purposes as they might deem practicable and right, and if they should deem any object impracticable and wrong that they would devote the whole of it to such of the objects deemed practicable and right. The church authorities now propose to apply the entire fund to the two purposes named which must be conceded practicable and lawful, and they on behalf of the entire sect pray the court to decree that they shall devote it to these two lawful purposes and that they may be prohibited from applying it to any other.

In the case of Jackson vs. Phillips and others, the court said: "When a charitable intent appears on the face of the will but the terms used are broad enough to allow of the fund being applied either in a lawful or an unlawful manner the gift will be supported and its application restrained within the bounds of the law."

When the dedication is broad enough to allow the trustee to apply the fund to unlawful as well as lawful purposes the court will limit its application to the lawful ones. When the terms of the gift authorize the trustees to devote the fund to either of these two subjects, one lawful and the other illegal, its application will be confined to the legal purposes and the illegal one will be rejected. "The principle of these cases seems to be the same that although a valid charitable use should happen to be joined by way of alternative with one which is invalid, no matter how, the manner being altogether indifferent, the former will not be prejudiced by its connection with the latter."

Bocey's Law of Trusts, p. 232.

There is English authority entitled to great weight, to the effect that if a testator gives one charitable fund to two or more objects in definite proportions and one fails, the other objects that have not failed may be substituted for the one that has and the entire fund may be devoted to them, unless the terms of the will exclude such an application.

In the case of Attorney General vs. Ironmongers' Company, 7 English Chancery Reports, 578, Lord Chancellor Brougham said, "When a testator gives one charitable fund to three several classes of objects, unless he excludes by most express provisions the application of one portion to the purpose to which the others are destined, it is clear that the court may thus execute his intention in the event of an impossibility of applying that portion to its original destination."

The character of charity is impressed on the whole fund; there is good sense in presuming that had the testator known that one object was to fail he would have given its appropriate fund to the increase of the funds destined to the objects of his bounty; and there is convenience in acting as he would himself have done. This is the foundation of the doctrine of cy pres. This case was also before the court when Cottenham vs. Lord Clarendon, and in considering the rule of construction in such cases he said:

"It is obviously true that if several charities be named in a will and one fail for want of objects, one of the others may be found to be cy pres to that which has failed; and if so, it being approved by the testator ought to be an additional recommendation; but such other charity ought not, as I conceive, to be preferred to some other more nearly resembling that which has failed."

In such a case the weight of authority in this country, as we think, is that the amount specially directed to be applied to the object that fails will be devoted to any other whether expressly named in the will or dedication or not so named, if the terms of the will or dedication, in the light of the circumstances, authorize the court to infer that such an application is within the general intent of the testator or donor.

But the case of Attorney General vs. The Ironmongers' Company is not analogous to the one in hand. In that the trustee was directed to apply one half of the estate to one object and the other half to two other objects in equal proportions, so that it was necessary to apply the portion which the testator had expressly devoted to the object that failed to other objects; it was necessary to substitute another or other objects.

It appears from the evidence before us that the contributions to the fund in controversy were made with the understanding that they should be applied to church purposes, but that it was optional with the First Presidency to which object, and if to more than one, the amount to each. The donations were to all or any as those church officers might determine, and the court is asked to limit the application to two church purposes that are lawful. We have no doubt that this court in the exercise of its ordinary chancery jurisdiction may limit the application of this fund to the lawful purposes.

Defendants' solicitors also insist that the report of the master and accompanying evidence show that the church sanctioned the practice of polygamy by the means of, and in obedience to the manifesto of its President, and a resolution of its general conference adopted on the 6th of October, 1890.

In that manifesto, which is in evidence, the following language is found:

"We are not teaching polygamy or plural marriage or permitting any person to enter upon its practice. Inasmuch as laws have been enacted by congress forbidding plural marriages, which laws have been pronounced constitutional by the court of last resort, I hereby declare my intention to submit to those laws and to use my influence with the members of the church over which I preside to have them do likewise. And I now publicly declare that my advice to the Latter-day Saints is to refrain from contracting any marriage forbidden by the law of the land.

And the resolution adopted by the general conference of the church on motion of Lorenzo Snow is: "I move that recognizing Wilford Woodruff as the President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and the only man on earth at the present time who holds the keys of the sealing ordinances, we consider him fully authorized by virtue of his position to issue the manifesto which has been read in our hearing, and which is dated September 24, 1890; and that as a church in general conference assembled, we accept his declaration concerning plural marriage as authoritative and binding."

It appears from the evidence reported by the Master that Wilford Woodruff, the president of the church, testified that his object in issuing the manifesto was "to announce to the world that the plural marriage had been forbidden by the church and that it could not be practiced thereafter; that it was presented to the quorum of the twelve apostles and accepted by them; that it was afterwards presented to the officers and members of the church assembled at their sixteenth semi-annual conference on October 6th, 1890; that the conference received and adopted it by a unanimous vote; that there was present about ten thousand officers and members; the representation was a fair one from the whole territory, . . . and other places."

The witness further testified in substance that he has never heard of any opposition to it or dissent from it by any member of the Church; that to the best of his knowledge the members of the Church willingly accepted and adopted it; that it would be contrary to the law of the Church for any member of it to enter into or contract a plural marriage, that any person entering into plural marriage after that date would be liable to excommunication from the Church, that there has not been any polygamous or plural marriage entered into or contracted by any member of the Church to his knowledge since the date of the manifesto; that he has not since that date assented to the practice of polygamy in any way or manner and that he does not know of any other officer of the Church that has; that he does not have any hope or expectation that the practice of polygamy will ever be re-established in the future; that all the revelations that the Church has ever accepted by a vote; that he believes in the principle of polygamy and presumes that the members of the Church do; that a principle may be believed in as a true one and still not be practiced; that a failure of any member to follow the manifesto would become a subject of Church discipline; that the intention of the manifesto was to require obedience to all the laws; that he issued the manifesto by inspiration and that he believed it was his duty to do so; that the manifesto and the resolution is the law of the Church, the law of God to us. We are required to observe that doctrine and tenet of our faith in our practices. He was asked: Q. President Woodruff, do you believe that the principle of plural marriage was revealed to the Church through Joseph Smith from the Almighty? A. I do. Q. Do you believe that the Almighty has revealed to the Church, through you, that it is discontinued and is no longer to be practiced? Q. You believe that? A. Yes, sir. The witness further answered, "my view is that inspiration is revelation."

The witness further testified in substance that the manifesto also prohibited the practice of unlawful exaltation. Other witnesses holding high official positions in the Church corroborated the testimony of its President, and there is no evidence before us tending to prove that any of the Church authorities, or that with their consent any of its members, since the date of the manifesto, have to their knowledge taught, advised, counseled or consented to the practice of polygamy or unlawful exaltation.

If the uncontracted testimony and evidence before us can be relied upon, it proves that the Church authorities and its members regard the manifesto and its resolution of October 6th, 1890, as prohibiting the practice of polygamy, and that they regard this prohibition as the law of God to them. That within the pale of civilization where laws exist against it, the practice of polygamy is wrong, but that outside of this limit it may be rightfully practiced.

Assuming that they believe that the Supreme Lawgiver in a revelation to Joseph Smith the then head of the church sanctioned polygamy, and in another revelation about forty years afterwards to Wilford Woodruff then its head, prohibited its practice within the limit mentioned it follows that they believe that the Lawgiver sanctions polygamy where the sentiments of civilization are not against it, and where it is not prohibited by law; but there were such sentiments and laws are against it, it is wrong, that the Almighty regards the sentiments of civilization and the will of human law-makers as expressed in obedience to their reason and conscience as binding on the people within their jurisdiction; that he requires obedience to the law of the land.

The theory of civil or municipal government as expressed in the declaration of independence is, that it is based upon the will of the people, expressed according to the dictates of their reason and conscience. This theory the most of us believe in, and if the Mormon is right, God has in a revelation to them recognized and sanctioned this theory as sound.

Assuming that there is a Supreme Being who is the source of all power and wisdom, many of us believe he does so express his will so far as human government go, through the reason and conscience of mankind in constitutions and laws.

Importance is attached by the Master in his report, and counsel lay stress upon the statement of the President that polygamy is right, but that it is wrong to practice it when the sentiments of the people and municipal law is against it.

According to his statement he has an abstract belief in polygamy where laws exist against it. In other words he believes in the principle in the abstract under such circumstances, but does not believe in it in the concrete.

The government is not authorized to deprive any person of his property against his will, except by forfeiture or escheat according to law, or by appropriating it to the payment of public taxes in the mode the law prescribes or in pursuance of the law of eminent domain, with just compensation. It cannot divest any individual or any class of the people of their property, or deny to them the right to control it or to devote it to any object they may choose, simply because they may entertain wrong political or religious beliefs; the doing of either would be a plain violation of those principles of civil and religious liberty which underlie our whole political system. The intent and the resulting act may together be defined as crime and punished; but the intent alone cannot be. The perceptions, the feelings, the beliefs, or the consciences of mankind cannot be regulated by human laws. Such laws would transcend the power of all just governments.

We do not feel authorized to withhold from the Latter-day Saints the right to devote their property to charitable objects simply because we may think they have wrong beliefs; or to undertake the eradication of such beliefs by denying to them the right to the enjoyment of their property or the right to appropriate it to lawful purposes.

Polygamy having been abandoned by the church, the remaining purposes to which the personal property in question has been dedicated and to which it may be applied by the church appear to be lawful. And in view of this the writer of this opinion is unable to understand upon what principle of law this court can deny to this church the right to appropriate and apply this fund to such purposes. He is of the opinion that it should be vested in Wilford Woodruff, George Q. Cannon and Joseph F. Smith its First Presidency, and in their successors in office, the agents selected by the church to be devoted and applied to them to those purposes according to the will of the church and the wishes of its donors. A majority of the court, however, is of the opinion that it should be vested in a trustee selected by the court and in his successor or successors to be appointed by the court to be devoted exclusively to the support and aid of the people of the church and to the building and repairing of its houses of worship, and that he should be required to give a bond before entering upon his duties sufficient to secure the amount that may come to his hands, and his performance of the duties of the trust, and that he should be required to report to the court on the 1st day of January of each year his action as such trustee.

A decree will be entered by the court in accordance with this opinion.

We concur:

BLACKBURN, J.
MINK, J.

When Judge Zane had concluded his reading of the court's opinion in the Church case, reported on pages 5 and 6 of this issue, Attorney F. B. Richards inquired whether the court would receive a suggestion as to the person to be appointed trustee.

District Attorney Varian remarked that if the court would permit him to say a word, perhaps that step would not be necessary. The attorney general now moved for an order directing the clerk to note an exception at the foot of the decree, on the ground that it was contrary to the law and the proof, and further, that the report should have been remanded to the Master in Chancery, inasmuch as he appeared to have misconstrued a portion of the decree.

Attorney Dickson said that inasmuch as the fund was to be devoted to the poor of the Church and the repair of houses of worship, it seemed to him that one who was a member of that faith would be the proper person to administer it. It would be unwise to select as trustee a member of any other sect.

Judge Zane asked if counsel were ready to suggest anyone as trustee; whereupon Attorney Richards named Bishop William H. Preston.

The Court asked if Mr. Varian had anything to say.

The District Attorney answered no beyond this—"It might go to President Woodruff so far as the government is concerned—that is, if the decree stands."

Attorney Richards suggested, in view of what the district attorney has said, that President Wilford Woodruff be appointed trustee of this fund; he being trustee in trust elected by the members of the Church and holding the title to their property. In support of this suggestion Mr. Richards called attention to section 28 of the Edmunds-Tucker Act, which provides that the title to Church property shall be held by trustees elected by the Church.

The court took the matter under advisement till 2 p.m.

Upon its re-assembling at 2:25 this afternoon Judge Zane handed down the final decree in the Church case, appointing Leonard G. Hardy (Bishop of the Second ward) trustee. His bond was fixed at $500,000.

SAMOA CONFERENCE.

The semi-annual conference of the Upolu Saints commenced at Fagali, Upolu, Samoa, on October 3d.

At an early hour in the morning the Siumu boat arrived, bringing a number of the Saints from the south side of the island. Shortly afterwards the Lalovi boat, well filled with Saints, arrived from the west end of the island. After the customary greetings, and the drinking of the aia, the morning meeting began, President George E. Browning presiding. The following missionaries were present: President George E. Browning, R. M. Stevens, H. L. Bassett, George E. Abel, L. A. Bailey, A. Twitchell, George McCune, C. E. Poole, Thomas H. Hilton and C. E. Summerhays. President George E. Browning made a few opening remarks and then Elder C. W. Poole was called upon to address the congregation Elder George E. Abel followed. Benediction by Elder George McCune.

At the afternoon meeting Elder L. A. Bailey was the first speaker. Next came Elders C. E. Summerhays and R. M. Stevens. Benediction by Thos. H. Hilton.

After this meeting the Saints indulged in athletic sports, competing for small prizes furnished by the missionaries. In the evening the company gathered in the meeting house to witness the "Siva" or native dancing. The missionaries sang some English hymns and played selections on the harmonica. After drinking a bowl of "ava" the meeting broke up.

On Sunday morning meeting was called to order by President George E. Browning. Elder H. L. Bassett presented the names of the Apostles, of the authorities both local and general, and of the missionaries laboring in Samoa. These were all sustained by unanimous vote. After reading a report of the mission, Brother Bassett made a few remarks, and exhorted the Saints to faithfulness.

Elder George McCune spoke on the plan of salvation.

Benediction by Brother Hilo.

Afternoon meeting was also called to order by President George E. Browning, who announced the ordination of Brother Paalogo to the office of Teacher. The ordination was performed at the hands of Elders Browning, Stevens, Twitchell and Bassett. The president then addressed the assembly, instructing the Saints to put aside all thoughts of a temporal character, and concentrate their minds on things of the Lord.

Elder A. Twitchell endorsed the words of the former speaker and offered a few observations on baptism.

An evening meeting was held, when President Browning invited all who felt disposed to rise and make a few remarks. The following Saints responded: Hilo, Paaloli, Palea, Fasolo, Taupau, Nalai, Taumai and Maia. Two others, Talisua and Tala, non-members of the Church, also spoke. Elder T. H. Hilton bore a faithful testimony.

Conference adjourned for six months. Benediction by Elder George McCune.

H. L. BASSETT, Clerk.

THE TUTUILA SAINTS.

On the morning of Saturday, Sept. 10th, the Tutuila Saints assembled at Aia, in their new meeting house, on the occasion of their semi-annual conference. Brother A. L. Green, local president, presiding. The following named missionaries were present: Brother George E. Browning, president of the Samoan mission and adjacent islands, Elders A. L. Green, A. W. Harding, F. Vanoult, R. E. Dimond, William Low and James Ricks. Of the native Priesthood there were present—Tane, Manoa and Lemafa. A congregation of about seventy assembled. The first speaker was President Browning. He gave some excellent instructions. Congregational singing; prayer by Brother James Ricks.

At 3 p.m. the Saints assembled. The speakers were Brothers James Ricks and Wm. Low. Benediction by President Browning.

Shortly after the close of this meeting three baptisms were performed, Brother

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Conference was held at Morrison, Perry county, Miss., Saturday and Sunday, Nov. 5th and 6th, 1892. All the Elders in the conference were present. The first meeting commenced Saturday at 10 a. m. The speakers were Elders J. I. May, I. H. Barlow, W. D. Rencher and President J. A. Farley, and the time was occupied in giving good counsel to the Saints.

President J. G. Kimball arrived at 1 p. m. In the afternoon meeting Elder Daniel Moss spoke upon faith, Elder J. H. Ence upon repentance and President Kimball occupied the remainder of the time, dwelling upon our duties, purity of life, the operations of the Holy Spirit, etc.

A Priesthood meeting convened Sunday at 8 a. m., in which good counsel, especially upon the necessity for the Elders to push out into new fields and teaching the worthy Saints the necessity of gathering.

The speakers Sunday morning were Elders A. D. Nebeker, W. D. Rencher, J. J. Holbrook and J. I. May, and the subjects dwelt upon were baptism for remission of sins, the laying on of hands, also the workings of the Holy Ghost, the organization of the Church, the apostasy and restoration of the Gospel.

President Kimball occupied the time in the afternoon. He spoke of the apostasy, the first principles and that faith and works are essential to salvation.

Sunday noon all partook of a bountiful repast prepared and brought to our place of meeting by the kind friends and Saints of Morrison.

The Elders met in counsel meeting Monday morning and received much valuable instruction from President Kimball, after which they were assigned to their respective fields as follows:

A. D. Nebeker and J. J. Holbrook to Green county; W. D. Rencher and A. J. Blackwell to Perry county; J. A. Farley and J. H. Ence to Marion county; J. I. May and J. F. Haycock to Pike county; I. H. Barlow and J. M. Phelps to Lawrence county.

Elder Daniel Moss was released to return home with the November emigration.

Reports from the Elders showed the conference to be in a prosperous condition. The records show 87 baptisms and 28 children blessed since March last.

A good spirit prevailed throughout the conference, and was a time of rejoicing for the Elders, Saints and all who attended.

W. D. RENCHER, Clerk of Conference.

THE FAR NORTH.

SWEDEN.

New editions of the letters of Charles XII will soon be published in Swedish and German.

A noble man is Alfred Noble, the Swedish inventor of smokeless gun powder, who recently joined the Austrian Peace Society. He has namely proven his devotion to the cause by contributing $540 to the propagation of the movement.

A couple of young lovers from Lerback, Nerike, went together to the minister to apply for a marriage license. Instead of promptly filling out the necessary blanks he spoke very earnestly about the importance of the step they were going to take, and this made such an impression on both of them that they agreed to drop the matter then and there.

Eighteen members of the Upper house of the Riksdag have resigned. It looks almost like a stampede. F. F. Berg, the representative, voices a general sentiment among the liberal members who have resigned, when he says: "I am tired of speaking to deaf ears, tired because I can accomplish nothing on account of the economical and political policy prevailing in our legislation and administration."

This is the manner, in which the "Ost-goten" sizes up the political situation in Norway: "The liberal movement in Norway is of the greatest importance to us. Norway will soon be on the height of political liberty and social development. No nobility, no great landlords, universal suffrage, free churches, no tariff, an insignificant royalty, popular education, courts of conciliation instead of war.... But Sweden has the same king as Norway. And how can the political barbarism of Sweden be perpetuated when the people in the other country of the king becomes a thoroughly free people? Right here lies our great hope, and that is what makes the Conservatives mad. This is the reason why the two peoples must be prevented from extending their hands to each other. And this is also the reason why the Norwegians and the Norwegian government are so despicable in the eyes of royalty, of the clergy, the army, the landlords and of the bureaucracy."

NORWAY.

A work on Christopher Columbus and the Discovery of America is under preparation by Prof. Gustav Storm and will be published complete about Christmas.

Girls under 16 and boys under 15 years of age have been forbidden to appear on any public stage in Christiania or to accept employment at restaurants without special permit from the authorities. Nor are children allowed to offer flowers, newspapers, etc., for sale at such places or to be on the streets for such purposes after 9 o'clock during the winter months.

The Viking ship intended for the Chicago World's Fair is to be built at Sandefjord near the place, where its prototype the ancient Gokstad vessel, was unearthed some fifteen years ago. It is to be ready for delivery in February next, and Mr. Christiansen, a well known ship builder who has charge of the work, is already busily engaged collecting material for it. Everything going into the ship will be of Norwegian growth, and workmanship except the keel, there being no oak timber big enough in the country for that purpose. Not even in Germany can timber of the required dimensions—156 feet long, 16 inches high and 8 inches wide—be obtained, and Canada will be called upon to furnish the piece.

DENMARK.

The papers of Copenhagen are having no end of fun with an old maid, who keeps 27 cats, 3 rats and a mouse, and tends to them as tenderly as if they were her own babies.

A London publishing house will soon issue a choice selection of translations of Scandinavian literature. The translation will be made by Baron A. Walteent Copenhagen.

"The Eiffel Tower" at Sondermarken, Copenhagen, is being built. It is a copy of the French structure of the same name, but will be only 500 feet high. As the ground, on which it stands, however, is 100 feet above the level of the sea, it will raise 600 feet above its surroundings. The passengers will be carried to the top of it by means of elevators.

DEATH OF CHARLOTTE VANDYKE.

The many friends of Mrs. Charlotte Vandyke will be grieved to learn of that estimable lady's death, the sad event occurring at her residence No. 85 Canyon road, this city, on Saturday last. Her demise was sudden and unexpected and was due to heart failure. The deceased was the wife of William Vandyke, at one time a leading citizen and business man of Ogden, but who has resided in this city for some years past.

The deceased was born at Balford, near Manchester, England, February 8th, 1840, and was the daughter of Robert and Elisabeth Cooper Pixton. She leaves a husband and ten children (six sons and four daughters) to mourn her death.

AMENITIES OF THE CAMPAIGN.

The Republican national committee has issued a circular to the people at large and the followers of that standard particularly, in which a warning is sounded against a "reserve crop of campaign lies" which it was thought might be looked for today. It was promised that the said crop would be prolific and unusually sensational, which leads us to conclude that they will be "stunners" indeed if the bill is filled as promised. The Democratic committee, not to be outdone in the encyclical business, is also to the fore with words of warning, containing a statement of Republican iniquities, falsehoods and frauds, and closing with an injunction to lay aside other business on election day and let nothing interfere with a full vote for Cleveland and Stevenson.

This kind of thing may properly be styled the cap sheaf of the campaign. The voluminous field orators and the dense floods of political literature have accomplished about all for weal or woe that they are capable of, and it is now for headquarters to put on the finishing touches, which they have done in a manner that illustrates how dear to the political heart and useful to the pen and tongue of the skilled politician is the argumentum ad hominem; for instance—one party says to the other, "You are a liar!" to which the answer is borne back upon the sulphur-tinted atmosphere, "You're another!" This is not English, you know, it's strictly American, and it has become so that no well-regulated campaign, national or local, is considered complete without something of the kind. It will all be over in a day or two, and then we will gradually get down (or up) to a civilized and enlightened basis again.

THE PLACE FOR FRUIT GROWING.

Our esteemed friend O. W. Warner, of Moab, Grand county, Utah, whose communication on the subject of fruit raising and its encouragement by the press and by the Territorial Fair, was published a few weeks ago, writes again, under date of the 2nd inst., in a very interesting and diverting manner on his favorite and a really important theme. His conclusion, that we "must be a new hand at the pump" if we "have not heard of the Grand county potatoes and of the man that raised such a large crop of squashes that he had to rent his neighbor's farm to pile them on," is so manifestly a bit of pleasant truth that it makes our confession of ignorance less humiliating. His further observation, that he "would ship a sample squash to the News if the weather were not so cold" that he couldn't trust it to a flat-car, and he is "afraid the railroad company would not enlarge the door of a covered car for the purpose," supplies another instance of how the soulless transportation companies ignore the rights and needs of their patrons. His final remark that since he cannot do us the pleasure of seeing such a squash, he at least can do himself the pleasure of sending a crate of apples, is not only quite philosophical but eminently entertaining as well. His apples have been duly received, critically examined and extensively tasted; and with the full consciousness that what we are about to say may be taken down and later used in evidence against us, we pronounce them monsters in size and solidity, models in flavor and juiciness, beauties in color and substance, and in all respects equal to, if not surpassing, the best we ever saw. At first glance, we thought he had reconsidered his promise and had really sent us squashes; and after mature consideration, we came to the opinion that a grower and a county that can show such fruit may well be pardoned for pride in the product, and ought to be encouraged to let fruit-growing be their sole and especial business from this time on.

Our correspondent rightly says that a newspaper has a great deal to do with making a people, and that in his travels he has found the News in the farmers' homes, esteemed by its readers not only for its Church news but for the interest it has always shown in the agricultural and horticultural labors of the community. He points out that the steady pursuit of this course will win new friends; and, firmly believing this, the News repeats its invitation to agriculturists and fruit and stock growers to furnish whatever of interest may come under their observation as the result of personal experience. We shall be happy to furnish space for all such communications. Brother Warner, taking us at our word, says: "I see what my neighbors over the line in Colorado are doing; they are planting fruit trees by the thousand, and they have not as good a climate as we have in Utah either. There is more to be made from one acre of fruit than from one hundred acres of grain, and without nearly as much labor"—a statement we can readily believe since looking at the samples he sends from Grand county. It will give us sincere pleasure to receive from him such suggestions as will show "the people of Utah how to live and make money without plowing in the same furrow that their grandfathers did;" and especially how "to grow fruit so large that hotels and retail dealers can't handle it at all."

LET THE POLE ALONE.

The death of Lieutenant Schwatka by suicide recalls to the mind some of the terrors which he and others passed through in the awfully inclement zone from whence no expedition has yet returned without serious losses nor with a greatly augmented stock of useful information. The uniformity with which these recitals of woe and misfortune, to say nothing of crime, are borne back to us from every expedition in that direction, are of themselves sufficient to justify governments in refusing to lend aid or countenance to any more, at least until some plan possessing other elements of feasibility than mere dogged determination on the part of those who go, can be devised and its merits made plainly apparent. The Jeannette expedition ought to be enough to show the civilized governments that good ships and brave men alone in a contest with such savagely hostile elements as prevail within the Arctic circle, do not stand anywhere near an even chance of returning safely, let alone accomplishing anything worth recording.

The nearest any one of these exploring parties has ever got to the pole is a trifle less than 500 miles and the scientific information acquired and brought back, reduced to practical proportions, was that they couldn't get any nearer and suffered a good deal getting that far. It would seem to be time to close the books for a period on such enterprises, and let hardy, courageous and accomplished men spend their energies where such expenditures will result in some benefit to themselves and their fellows.

BEFORE THE BATTLE.

In a few hours more the heat of the fray will be upon us, and in a shorter time thereafter the people of the nation will have sealed at the ballot box their choice of those whom they would have in power for the next four years. At this time of course nothing is known, the claims and counterclaims by party managers but serving to increase the uncertainty and make the doubtful doubt still more. The Democrats, according to reports received, have withdrawn from their labors with the calmness and satisfaction which only come of absolute conviction that their case is won, while the Republicans urge all the voters to be on hand and thus duplicate the great victory achieved by General Grant in his second race for the Presidency.

A good many claims on both sides are either poorly founded or we are at the brink of one of the greatest political revolutions the country has ever known. When Democrats with apparent seriousness place Massachusetts and Illinois in their column and Republicans figure on Alabama and Arkansas, those who are posted see how those states went four years ago can scarcely repress a smile, and those who are not can ascertain by referring to Saturday's issue of the DESERET NEWS. An independent view, and therefore one to be more relied upon, would reverse those claims and give the Southern States without exception to Mr. Cleveland, make debatable ground of New York, Connecticut, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin and Montana, give to General Weaver Kansas, Colorado, North Dakota, Wyoming, Idaho and Nevada, and all the rest to President Harrison. It would thus be seen that the winner must draw his winning support from the states classed as uncertain, and out of these neither can safely dispense with New York, whose thirty-six electoral votes will, if things come anywhere near adhering to the normal, determine the contest; but they are, we think, more nearly indispensable to the Democrats than to the Republicans; because Wisconsin was strongly Republican in 1888 and is more likely to go that way now than the other, while Michigan's vote will surely be divided, the President getting the majority of it. With the Empire state the sine qua non, a study of how it has gone heretofore and what the present indications on both sides are, is interesting at this time.

New York City and its immediate surroundings are the Democratic Gibraltar, the majority being seldom less than 60,000 and running up to fifty per cent. greater and more. This year the registration is largely increased, the gain presumably with the Democrats, notably. Republican estimates figure the city majority for their opponents down to 46,000 and the latter place it at 75,000 which would leave the Republicans with about 60,000 to overcome with their vote above the Harlem river in the former case and fully 90,000 in the latter, 85,000 and upward is claimed, the Democrats reducing this in their estimates forty to fifty per cent. so that the claims run from about 15,000 to 25,000 for Harrison in the whole state and 25,000 to 60,000 for Cleveland. As this is somewhat unsatisfactory, we might as well leave the lower part of the state and see how things look above the river. The following tables show the registration in the cities last year (when Flower, Democrat, was elected governor by nearly 48,000 majority) and that for this year, each party with its majorities then, being placed by its side:

This gives the Democrats a slight advantage if percentages hold good; but it is noticeable that there is a falling off in the state as compared with the vote of four years ago, the deficit being from 25,000 to 40,000; this shows a condition of apathy which may be favorable to either or neither, the reader will have to take his choice.

Following are the figures for the last two Presidential elections:

1884. Blaine above the Harlem, 400,915;
Cleveland, 335,114;
1884. Blaine below the Harlem, 161,090;
Cleveland, 224,330;
1888. Harrison above the Harlem, 451,014;
Cleveland, 346,543;
1888. Harrison below the Harlem, 197,719;
Cleveland, 270,112.

The following figures as to the registration and Democratic gains in New York city will be of assistance:

	Registration	Gain in 4 years.	Per cent.	Dem. gain.
1890.....	307,402	5,000	14	41,285
1884.....	244,906	38,490	17	45,064
1888.....	296,542	48,676	16	53,813
1892.....	349,830	23,288	8

The reader is now in possession of all the beforehand facts and figures of any consequence which he can well obtain and can form as close an estimate of the results as though he were on the ground—much better perhaps. All the apparent certainties on either side should be added together and of the sum totals the lesser subtracted from the greater; then by treating the elements of doubt in the same manner and comparing all the results, a conclusion can easily be reached— which the people may smash to smithereens with their blanket ballots on the morrow. They may, however, ratify it; there is no harm in trying.

ONE OFFICEHOLDER WHO WILL STAY

Matters affecting the President or the Presidency of the United States have a peculiar interest on a day like this, when twelve millions of freemen are going through the solemn, majestic and world-attracting performance of making their choice as to the head of the nation. Here in the vales of the mountains where we are not buttressed by state lines and where the domain is under the exclusive control of the government at Washington, we can only participate in spirit, but most of us take as keen an interest in the result as though each was armed with a ballot which would be cast for Presidential electors and counted the same as where sovereignty prevails.

Whatever may have been the choice of the people today, he will not be confronted at the beginning of his term nor perhaps at any time during it with the annoying newness of anything in, around or pertaining to the White House. Both of the principal candidates, one of whom must inevitably be chosen, have served a term there and know how it is for themselves; otherwise, notwithstanding that they are pretty well posted on general topics, we question if there are not some customs and conditions prevailing at the Executive Mansion that would seem quite useless if not annoying as well. One of the practices prevalent there is a relic of the early days, before we had the glare of the electric light, the clangor and rush of the locomotive, or the annihilation of time and space by the telegraph; it is maintained in all its primitive features for the simple reason that it is the only link in the shape of a domestic custom which binds this age with that of Washington and Jefferson, and it has thus become somewhat enshrined in the minds of those who live near the national headquarters; certainly, while utterly useless, it has been exempted from abolishment, while other things co-natal with it have passed away long ago.

The custom opposed of is the lighting of some large lanterns which stand out from the large white pillars of the front portico of the White House. When these were a light which lightened, "a many years ago," they were doubtless looked upon as indispensable adjuncts to the grand establishment over whose portals they held nocturnal way; but improved methods, not only in oil, which itself is beginning to have a back-number flavor, but in gas and electricity, have imparted to the "lanterns dimly burning" a sort of sickly glare which makes them as looking in the matter of ornamentation as of use. It is to be hoped that the progress which has come upon the land to stay may continue free from the hand of the vandal, at least so far as this picturesque relic is concerned.

Those who pass by the President's home at nightfall, if they look through the high iron railings which enclose the front lawn, may see an aged man coming deliberately along the flagged walk from the greenhouse, carrying a long stout ladder; this he places against the iron supports of the lanterns, to one of which he mounts and then, going into his pocket, produces a match, strikes it, lights the candle in its tin socket, comes down and repeats the performance until all the lamps are lit. We suspect the old man is himself a "relic of bygone days," that he has followed his present job since he was a young man—probably in James K. Polk's day—and that he does nothing else around the place. No matter what his politics, we guarantee he will never be disturbed nor his place otherwise filled until he is called to join those who once looked upon his duties at the White House not as a purely perfunctory performance but as a matter of some considerable consequence. Long may he stay!

BUSINESS ON THE RAILS.

One ray of comfort to Colonel Elliot F. Shepard acent his proposed one dollar railroad ride to the World's Fair, is found in the statement put out that the railroad industry just now is a most flourishing one in all respects. Statistics, it is claimed, show that the general business in this country is not only prosperous but gives promise of even better things; it is shown that transportation of passengers was never in better form, and that the Wagner and Pullman systems of sleeping accommodations are well nigh perfect. It is held, however, that the buffet service is only conditionally good; when there is not much travel a good "square meal" is laid before the passenger for the trifling consideration of one dollar, but this gratifying condition is negated by the accompanying statement that the dining cars are nearly always crowded to the point of suffocation, leaving us to conclude that the fare and treatment are bad in an inverse ratio. Added to this is the annoying assurance that these cars are always poorly ventilated, a condition of things which, it would seem, is so easily overcome that there is little if any excuse for it.

By the bye, if Colonel Shepard succeeds in his laudable undertaking, we hope he will have time to extend his field of operations westward and do as much for the people out here as he contemplates doing for those of the east. We are considerably further away from Chicago than New York is, but would not object to paying the difference. A dollar fare between those points would mean, at the same ratio, about $1.75 from here to the Lake city, or, say, $2.00, which would leave considerable of a margin for the railroad. To be truthful about it, a good many of us would be willing to pay several times that amount, as we will certainly have to do, willing or not, if we go.

NEW LIGHTS IN LONDON.

Among the new members of parliament elected as a result of the latest appeal to the English people, none is more conspicuous or more deserving of notice than John Burns, the labor leader. The rise of this man to prominence is rapid enough to dispel completely the old notion that it is only in America that merit can attract popular attention and be suddenly rewarded with popular favor; for it was not until the great London dockmen's strike a short time ago that Burns was known outside of the restricted limits usually confining men of his class. Now that he is famous, however, people are discovering that he is a man of thorough self-reliance, great magnetism, sober judgment, and superior executive ability; and—what will be of still more interest to the gentler sex—that his domestic life "has been exceedingly beautiful," his wife having given proof of abundant intellectual and moral strength and having been to him an effective support, if not indeed his main stay, during all his public career. Naturally he is proud of her, and wherever he goes he feels safer if she is by his side. It is said that at labor meetings, if he notices her he calls out helplessly: "Where is my wife;" and that he can confer no greater honor upon his friends than to invite them to the home table over which she presides. Mrs. Burns is described as beautiful and graceful-looking, and possessing the qualities of a real heroine. She is scarcely less popular with the working classes than is her husband; during the great strike while he was haranguing the dockmen, and conferring with the leaders and Cardinal Manning and other arbitrators, she was cutting bread and ministering to starving women at one of the depots established for the purpose, and frequently would be absent from home, on the mission of mercy, for twenty-four hours at a time. It will do no harm to English society to meet and become better acquainted with people of this type. Their presence would grace the most refined and exclusive of her majesty's "drawing rooms."

The asphalt deposits in the Duchesne country are beginning to look up and many indications of that mineral are being made.

THE HOMELY USEFUL YAWN.

At the end of a long, laborious and measurably scrimonious campaign, as we look back upon what we have passed through and ahead to the rest which we expect to have for a good while, we can scarcely resist the natural inclination to begin the needed period of repose with a yawn of cavernous origin and barn-door dimensions. A good many people do not understand the restful, quieting, soothing effect of that widespread, guttural and soul-reaching performance, and a good many more can't describe it even as well as we have done it here. Elsewhere, it is analyzed as a long-drawn, forcible inspiration followed by a shorter respiration; and Dr. Naegeli, of Berlin, says it is one of nature's many remedies the proper application of which depends upon good judgment. This goes to show that the doctor is a stranger to the American political campaign, or he would realize that in such cases it is a sign of weariness and that when the time comes for it, it does not wait upon the judgment at all but just comes right along, distorting the countenance for the time being, but expanding the chest and imparting genuine relief to the system.

Mr. Julius Slinde, in the Berlin Unser Zeit, gives a scientific description of a yawn which adds more to its mystery than ever. He says: "In yawning, not only the muscles which move the lower jaw are used, but also the breathing muscles of the chest, and he who yawns to his heart's content also raises and extends the arms. In the deepest inspiration the chest remains extended for a short time, the eyes are almost or entirely closed, the ears somewhat raised, the nostrils dilated. Inside the mouth, the tongue becomes round and arched, the palate stiffly stretched, and the uvula is raised, almost entirely closing the space between the nose and throat. At the beginning of the inspiration a cracking noise is heard in the ears, a proof that the duct leading to the hearing also succumbs to this stretching."

Having nearly, if not quite, brought us into such a frame of mind that an involuntary yawn is strictly in order, this savant then proceeds to convey to our understanding the information that "if the yawning has reached the deepest point it will require from one to one and a half seconds for it to become noticeable to the hearing. In order to observe this, let one place himself at a sufficient distance from a clock, so that its ticking will not be easily heard, and yawn deeply. During this deep breathing the sound of the clock is not perceptible to the most careful listening. All this simply goes to show that yawning sets a number of muscles to work, and particularly those which are not directly subject to the will."

Mr. Slinde graciously admits that one who is yawning does not present a very agreeable appearance, to which proposition there will be no opposition. He mitigates the uncomfatableness of the appearance, however, by showing that it is very agreeable to the performer, another allegation to which there will be no traverse; "the stretching of the muscles causes a feeling of comfort, and it is the most natural gymnastics of the lungs imaginable," a condition of things which causes Dr. Naegeli to advise the people to never mind the "decency" of the case but just go ahead and yawn every time they feel like it, no matter who is looking or what the occasion; it is good exercise for the pulmonary organs and is a better preventive than physic or fumigation—or words to that effect.

The reader may now proceed to try it for himself.

A HAPPY SELECTION.

It is to be hoped there is truth in the report that Emilio Castelar, the Spanish patriot, has been invited to be the orator at the opening of the World's Fair next May. Scarcely a better choice could have been made. He is a statesman and a scholar, eminent also as one of the world's orators; and as the leading Spaniard of his day, he is in every way qualified to bear appropriately the message of congratulation from the old world to the new. A contemporary well says: "No other European could come with a more intimate knowledge of and sympathy with our institutions. He has long been an ardent republican, and it was under his leadership that his country undertook the republican form of government. He can speak from a profound study of free institutions, from a wide and varied experience in public affairs, and his words will have the background of a character of the highest type." He is a figure known to and appreciated by both hemispheres,—sturdy, sagacious and progressive. America could not do a more graceful act, nor more fittingly honor Spain, than name this ripe and scholarly statesman for a distinguished part in our Columbian festivities.

TROUBLE IN SCANDINAVIA.

The Morgenblad, a newspaper published in Christians, Sweden, recently stirred up the populace of that portion of Scandinavia considerably by declaring that Russia is trying to provoke a rupture between the former nation and Norway; that in the last named the radicals, urged on by large sums of money from Russia and France, are fomenting the agitation, the object of which is, according to the newspaper quoted, to bring about such a state of things between Norway and Sweden that they will have something to think about besides an alliance with Germany in case of war. The story sounds improbable enough, but it seems to have sufficient foundation to cause no little excitement among the people prospectively affected.

There are no threatened wars now, nor, so far as is known, any preparations going on to that end. It need not be considered, however, that this is any more a sign of peace than is the present condition a forerunner of war. Even if war were contemplated there need not and probably would not be as much of that hurry, excitement and bustle as we have been accustomed to, for the reason that the nations militant are about as perfectly prepared for an outbreak as they can be. In Germany and France particularly, all frontier cities are fortresses, the towns supply stations, and every citizen is a soldier sleeping on his arms. No wonder, when the volcano which sleeps under Europe is taken into consideration, a rumor like that reported brings consternation to the Swedes; it would be a wonder indeed if it were otherwise.

A USEFUL PAMPHLET.

An interesting and valuable little publication has just been issued from the press of the DESERET NEWS, entitled "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints—Its Religion, History, Condition and Destiny." It is an address delivered before the Ethical Society at South Place Institute, London, by Elder James H. Anderson, of this city, during his recent mission to England; and the subject matter is conveniently arranged and intelligently treated under the following subdivisions:

Introductory, Articles of Faith, The Godhead, Men Judged by Their Works, The Atonement, The Gospel Ordinances—Faith, Repentance, Baptism, Baptism for the Dead, The Holy Ghost, Divine Authority, Officers, Spiritual Gifts, The Apostasy, The Book of Mormon, Revelation, Restoration of the Gospel, Other Doctrines, A Glance at History, Present Condition, Future Destiny, The Gospel Message.

THE DEMOCRATS SWEEP THE DECK.

Grover Cleveland will be the next President of the United States.

Adlai E. Stevenson will be the next Vice President.

The House of Representatives will be Democratic by a large majority and the Senate Democratic by a small one.

Thus, for the first time in thirty-two years, the government passes entirely into the hands of the Democratic party.

The defeat of the Republican party is so complete and far-reaching that it amounts to a rout; it is unprecedented in the history of the country, and can be most fittingly likened to the crushing disaster which overtook the French forces at Mount St. Jean.

If the Democratic party acts wisely, it will use the new lease of power with which it has been entrusted, not for mere partisan aggrandizement, but for the greatest good to the greatest number of our people; it will act in moderation in all things, and will so shape legislation that, while fulfilling the promises and acting up to the principles of its platform, nothing revolutionary or dangerously experimental will be permitted. After the fourth of next March the whole and not a part only of the responsibility for what is done and what is left undone will rest upon the Democratic party; and whether the trust reposed in it shall be continued after four years or out off and the Republican or some other party placed in power, depends entirely upon itself. The hands that have made can unmake, and the people have already shown that they are not afraid to act in a most decisive and peremptory manner when they feel called upon to do so.

As to Utah—well, we will wait and see what will be done for or against it. Probably we shall receive more consideration than hitherto, for those who have promised and pleaded in extenuation of non-fulfillment their inability to do any better because of some portion of the government being against them, will no longer have that or any other excuse to offer. With a Delegate from this Territory in harmony with the dominant party, there would seem to be nothing wanting to make measures in our behalf speedy and complete.

What we know of President Cleveland is of a character to justify the most hopeful anticipations. He is a broad-minded, well-informed, unprejudiced, impartial, Christian gentleman who means what he says and, if occasion requires, says what he means. We look for much from him during the next four years and feel justified in expressing the belief that we shall not look in vain.

Vice-President Stevenson is not so well known in Utah, but those who are acquainted with him speak in the highest terms of praise of his qualities as an official and a citizen. He was Assistant Postmaster General under President Cleveland, and his conduct of that important position was marked with great executive ability and firmness of character. As President of the Senate he will not have much of an opportunity, but will doubtless use what there is to the best advantage.

We may now prepare for the "new deal." In the language of Judge Zane, "the world moves."

WEALTH FROM REAL ESTATE.

We can all or most of us remember the great "boom" here of three years ago or a little less; some few remember it because they are unable for a very forgettable reason to forget it. At that time property in some instances sold fabulously high; it was quite easy to sell almost anything in the shape of realty, and buying and selling with decided profits on each turn became a business in which a good many who were not operating under the protectingegis of a license participated. The times have changed wonderfully, but it is hardly to be expected that the "traffic in dirt" will remain as flat as at present.

Probably the greatest and so far most solid speculation in this ill-fated market place in Denver, where fortunes have been amassed on quite limited investments and in comparatively short times. There is the case of John Brian Walker, proprietor of the Comopolitan Magazine, who recently sold to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad Company for $2,500,000 a piece of land in that place for which he paid, less than ten years ago, the sum of $1,500. "I fancy this is the most wonderful rise in the value of real estate that has ever occurred in this country," says a writer in the Washington Star. "What wonderful luck! I suppose many readers will exclaim. As usual with successful men, there was no luck about it at all. Mr. Walker was possessed of the ability to see the value of this property before any one else saw it—that is all. When he bought it the territory was a detached piece of land in front of the city with a river channel between it and the land laid out as streets. Mr. Walker built a causeway to connect his purchase with the mainland, which cost him something, but not very much. The company was compelled to purchase this tract. It could not get along without it."

This is a case in which the ability to look a little ahead is of more value than capital, and there are many such. The above is not the only instance of Mr. Walker's foresight and good management, it being shown that he has netted from similar investments in Denver more than $500,000 additional, so that, from a man of small means, he now figures as a triple millionaire.

We can't all paint, nor sing, nor act, nor write, nor "hit" the real estate market at the right time; one, perhaps, as much a faculty as any other, and the best plan, if you are not gifted in that way, is to buy no more real property than you can afford and that, too, for your own uses.

WORSE THAN EVER.

Some of Colonel R. G. Ingersoll's admirers go so far as to claim that the great agnostic is unassailable; that the criticisms and animadversions regarding his written and spoken utterances have no other effect upon him than is produced by the waves of the ocean washing against the foundation of Gibraltar, and so on. We are not in the Colonel's confidence, but knowing him to be a man of good judgment in most matters, of good breeding and education and of decidedly refined tastes, we feel authorized to say that a little less fulsome adulation would suit him as well and the majority of the people a good deal better.

Col. Ingersoll's favorite weakness is rummaging through necrology and fishing out some heretic or unbeliever from the records of middle or recent ages, and, having found his subject, he proceeds at once to canonize it, finding virtues which must be a reflex of the Colonel's own virtuous soul, for history fails to point them out to us. Notably in this this case with Bruno and Voltaire. Coming along down the boulevard of time, he picks up the image of Thomas Paine and places it before us in a new and splendid light—splendid to the Colonel and his kind, but to no others, at least to none that refuses to find splendor in the denial of things sacred and orthodox; and finally the eloquent defender of infidelity gets down to current events and men, placing before our gaze a picture of Renan which cannot resemble the original very much, or else all other portraits of the famed blasphemer are more or less vile.

"In spite of the heartless 'scheme' of things," says Ingersoll, "he still found it in his heart to say, 'When God shall be complete He will be just,' at the same time saying that 'nothing proves to us that there exists the central consciousness—a soul of the universe—and nothing proves the contrary.' So, whatever was the verdict of his brain, his heart asked for immortality. He wanted his dream, and he was willing that others should have theirs. Such is the wish and will of all great souls."

With all due deference to Col. Ingersoll's opinion, we fail to perceive the logic contained in the foregoing. If indeed there be any. The allegation that God is not a perfect Being, that is, that He is not complete and never will be until constructed upon the Renaissance or Ingersollian plan, may pass among admirers of irreverence and ribaldry, but not, surely, among even the more moderate freethinkers. It is a sentiment that shocks the Christian and must produce something like aversion in the minds of those who respect but are indifferent. The next sentence, about what is proved regarding the soul and what is not, is purely gratuitous—only the conclusion, or perhaps we would better say the assertion, of the materialist, an assertion in which they are disputed by thousands of men equal to themselves on all points of scholastic acquirements and personal cultivation, and infinitely superior to them in spiritual knowledge and respect for sacred things. Which of the two classes is the more likely to know regarding what Renan advances so brazenly and Ingersoll endorses so flippantly—the thousands or the two?

Proceeding further we will take the liberty of asking Col. Ingersoll how he is able to know that his fellow scoffer's heart asked for immortality, when the evidence is to the other way. Renan was an infidel, and, like most men of that class was more or less inconsistent at times; but surely he never did anything quite so self-stultifying as asking for that which he told the world could not exist, was not an entity in the grand economy of creation. Besides, the record shows that the Frenchman's heart was under very good control by his brain, and was not permitted to ask for what the mind could not or would not conceive of, thus dissipating another of the American's attempts to compromise the case with the Christian sentiment of the age, and we suspect with his own conscience too, if the truth could be known regarding his actual feelings.

The statement that Renan wanted his dream and was willing that others should have theirs, approaches the grotesque. It would have been a performance unworthy of an illiterate booby, let alone a man of letters, to have conceived the idea of depriving any people of their dreams, so the willingness in that regard attributed to him goes for nothing. If the Colonel seeks to shelter himself from the peculiarity (to be charitable) of such a declaration by saying that of course he speaks figuratively, that the dream spoken of is the hope, the impulse, yes, the knowledge of the heart that the soul lives and immortality prevails, he is in a worse position than ever, for obvious reasons. And then, how or by what means could either Renan or Ingersoll deprive anyone of even that dream, if they felt disposed to do so? To be willing for others to have it is a waste of words, utterly unworthy a man of even the Colonel's vast vocabulary.

"Such is the wish and will of all great souls." Very likely; but the Colonel only knows what is the wish and will of his own soul, and at latest advice he was not entirely sure that he had such a thing. If he has found out that important fact we are glad of it for his sake—so glad that we cheerfully overlook the yielding to a custom which obtains among some less gifted people, of determining the rule and scope of others by themselves.

A MOMENT FOR REFLECTION.

The election which has just passed proved in its concluding stages quite as exciting and noisy as the most enthusiastic partisans could have desired. In this respect it departed widely from its earlier promise, and must have been a disappointment to those who expected a calm, sober, quiet, non-sensational affair, with no appeal save to the intelligence and patriotism of the voters. It has not, indeed, been characterized by the bitter recriminations and the brutal personalities that have been conspicuous in other campaigns; but it went quite far enough in these directions to wound the sensibilities and disgust the good sense of the whole better element in the nation.

It is with sincere joy, therefore, that such persons see the great contest ended and sent to its place in history. Whether in its results the country will be benefited or otherwise depends altogether on the future, and even then to a great extent on the point of view. But that the country is relieved of a great strain, and will breathe easier now that the strain is removed, no one will for a moment question. All will rejoice that the blare and turmoil is over, and all ought to be anxious to see business resume its normal state, and animosity and hot partisanship relegated, if not forever at least for a time, to the rear.

In order that so desirable a condition may be quickly reached, it devolves upon the victors to exercise moderation and magnanimity in the hour of their triumph, and upon the defeated to display cheerful hope tempered with calm resignation. There should be no disposition on the one hand to gloat, or on the other to despair. The popular will as manifested at the polls was at best a sickle and uncertain quantity, and it behooves those launched upon a career of power and flushed with success to remember that their way may be brief and defeat as sweeping as that now administered to their opponents may be their portion next time. Under no circumstances can undue exultation and cruel jeers at the expense of the losers be justified. Surely those who are victorious can content themselves with the joys of success without being ungenerous, ill-mannered and un-Christianlike.

We would especially impress upon the Latter-day Saints the necessity of restraint and charity upon the present occasion. They have passed through a trying ordeal. Methods that cannot be justified by any right-minded person in his moments of reflection have been employed by both parties. The hearts of the people have been pained at many of the things said and done during the campaign. Men who have no love for the Saints and who would be pleased to see them torn by dissension, have rejoiced at the discord and the ill-feeling that some have sought to introduce—and which they have called a necessary part of our political education. Such precepts have in too many instances found ready acceptance. Inflamed by party zeal, some have been willing to believe the worst that their political friends could say about opposing candidates or their friends; and while rumors have been growing into slanders, harmless words have been woven into base misrepresentations. Much of this is known to all our readers, otherwise we should not speak of it. The subject is unpleasant and we would far rather ignore than magnify it. One allusion to it is permissible, perhaps, if there is reason for the hope that we may never be required to refer to it again. Indulging in that hope, the News urges upon the people of Utah that they now put away ill-feeling, rancor, complaining and bitterness, and set themselves to the duty of cultivating forgiveness, charity, faith and unity. Their neighbors confess that they have furnished abundant evidence of their ability to comport themselves properly in political affairs; now let them prove to themselves and their God the more important fact that they are brethren and sisters in the same covenant, concerned with one accord for their own salvation and the redemption of the world.

THE RESULT.

The smoke of the battle has now cleared away and we are given a clear view of the field excepting a few remote corners, the results in which will not be apt to change the outcome generally as herein set out. Altogether it is a great surprise to both the principal parties, to one because it got so much less and to the other because it got so much more than it expected. The greatest event in the way of an overturning was the result in Ohio, which was left to the Republicans by common consent and did not appear in the Democratic column in any table of computations prior to last evening; and when it was announced in the telegraphic columns of the News yesterday it was received with a great deal of incredulity, even by Democrats. Indiana going against the President was of course an unusual and unexpected event, but it has been held by his political opponents as fair fighting ground with chances in their favor all along, hence no such surprise was occasioned by its action. Next to Ohio comes California, which it was confidently believed would give a decided Harrison majority, but has, as it appears at this writing, gone for Cleveland; then come Illinois and Wisconsin in the order named, both of which have turned completely against the Republican party. Then Connecticut should be named, not because it went Democratic, for notwithstanding it is classed as a doubtful state, it has done that three or four times in succession; but because it gives the largest plurality it has ever given for a Democratic Presidential candidate. All the other states on the Cleveland side are solidly settled, and altogether the showing made for him is the enormous total of 204 electoral votes. This leaves but 140 to be divided between Harrison and Weaver; of these the former is certain of the vote of Iowa, 18; Maine, 6; Michigan, 8; Minnesota, 9; New Hampshire, 4; North Dakota, 3; Oregon, 3; Pennsylvania, 32; Rhode Island, 4; South Dakota, 4; Vermont, 4; Washington, 4; total, 94. This would leave 46 to Weaver if he has carried them all; but at this hour some states claimed for him are very close and correspondingly uncertain, Kansas, Nebraska and one in Oregon being the doubtful quantity.

The states electing legislatures which will choose United States senators are (where such choice results in a change from one party to another) as follows: New York, California, Nevada, Wisconsin and Wyoming, with possibilities of two or three more, notably Idaho, but the appearances at the time of writing are as here given. Every one of the states named except Nevada will return a Democrat to the Senate in place of a Republican, the one from that state being a "Weaver man," and therefore a Republican loss. There will be no change the other way. The Senate now stands—Republicans 47, Democrats (counting Kyle, S. D.) 40, People's 1; with the above changes it will stand—Democrats 44, Republicans 42, People's 2, a Democratic plurality of 2. If the latter have carried the Montana legislature it would change the plurality to 3 and be a majority of 1; if any other changes are made they will be for Republicans to Populists, and will thus diminish the Republican without increasing the Democratic vote. It should be remembered, in this connection, that Vice-President Stevenson is empowered to preside over the Senate, and with the vote so close he is likely to do so most of the time; on a tie he will have the casting vote, and this still further augments the Democratic chances.

It is still too early to forecast the next House of Representatives exactly, but it will be largely Democratic; not so large as at present, of course, but the plurality will not fall much if any below 100. It will thus be seen that the Democrats have captured everything, or nearly so.

GETTING AROUND THE LAW.

A good many people in the Southern States have never taken kindly to the enforced and unpaid-for deprivation of their slaves and the concomitant benefits conferred upon the negroes; these have seen fit to look upon the situation in the light of a mercantile transaction, claiming that since they bought the slaves mainly from traders in and of the North, it would have been more just and more honorable to have returned the money when the time for emancipation came. This is a short-sighted and altogether inadequate view to take of a situation involving the liberty and right to progress of millions of human beings, but it is or was pretty widely entertained nevertheless, and the means by which laws in aid of the freedmen have been circumvented while at the same time literally complied with, have been at times as ingenious as obstructive and annoying to the government's agents.

A conspicuous instance, but one not involving so much of actual injustice to the ex-slaves, was shortly after the civil rights bill was enacted, about twenty-five years ago. Some of its provisions were rather drastic to the average Southerner, but none of them was more so than that making it a punishable offense to discriminate between white and colored guests of any hotel, restaurant or other place of public entertainment in the United States. There was but one exception made, and that was in favor of private boarding houses, an institution which Congress magnanimously permitted the proprietors to conduct in accordance with their own social rules. Immediately nearly every hotel, tavern, restaurant and lodging place in the Southern States became a private boarding house! The manner in which public hostilities all at once disappeared from the public gaze would have done credit to the constructor of a transformation scene in a pantomime.

While there can be found but very few nowadays who blame the Southerners for that clever piece of strategy, there are still fewer north of Mason and Dixon's line who look with favor or even tolerance upon some other things which have been done in the name of the law by some of the Southern legislatures, and it is questionable if a majority of the people of the South will give sanction thereto. For instance, in 1886 the legislature of Louisiana passed a law to the effect that any laboring man who failed to make a contract for a year's work by January 10, and have in his possession that contract in writing, should be declared a vagrant and on conviction be sold to the highest bidder for one year, receiving no wages for his labor, the proceeds to go to the poor fund. Florida, Mississippi and Virginia also passed laws to the effect that any man who fails to work for wages in the locality where he lives shall on conviction be compelled to work one month for the party giving the information, without wages, with ball and chain attached if necessary.

These are in effect simply a nullification of the thirteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution, which provides that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States. Of course the evasion occurs on the question of criminality, the making what in many cases may be a misfortune which the victim of it would gladly escape if he could, a crime punishable with slavery for one year; it doesn't say "slavery" but that is exactly what it amounts to and it is all wrong.

There are a great number of people in the Northern states and territories who have never lived in the South but have been there and have only words of praise for the open-handed, undiluted friendliness with which the stranger is received and cared for, who have the utmost respect for the chivalrous sentiment pervading the people and the greatest tolerance for their traditions and peculiar customs; but none of these, we take it, could or will look approvingly upon measures having in view the annulment of our highest laws and the setting aside of rights guaranteed thereby. We all know how difficult it is to enforce regulations in a community all but unanimously opposed to them, but such opposition, for the sake of harmony all around, to say nothing of a common humanity, should be held in restraint where it cannot be overcome altogether. We are not aware of any such legislation having taken place recently, but it was rather common down South for a while; and we are quite sure that all of it has not been repealed, if indeed any of it has.

WOMEN VOTING FOR PRESIDENT.

It ought to be known, but is not very widely, that to the Territory of Utah belongs the honor of having first given to women the right to vote at general elections, and that it was exercised and in most cases enjoyed for several years, until it was abolished by Federal legislation. Those who occasionally credit Wyoming with being the pioneer commonwealth in the matter of woman suffrage of course do so through not being properly informed on the subject; of course we are speaking now of recent times.

Wyoming, however, enjoys the rare distinction of being the first state, since colonial days, in which the fair sex voted for President of the United States, which they did on Tuesday last. President Cleveland goes into the White House on the fourth of next March with the gratifying assurance that ladies actually participated in his election, at least they voted in an election in which he was the successful candidate; so that, in addition to having the biggest majority any governor ever had and the greatest vote for President any man ever had in time of peace, he now places among the distinguishing features of his triumph the circumstance to which our neighbor on the east gave birth.

It is related of a distinguished citizen of Laramie that he once said the men "encouraged the girls to vote in Wyoming" because it made them "hurry up and get the dishes done so as to get down to the polls." It is a recorded fact that ten years ago less than fifty per cent of the population of Wyoming were women, but they are catching up rapidly with the men in numbers as in political power. There are (or were in 1890) 39,343 men in Wyoming and there are 21,302 women. Alternate women delegates from Wyoming attended the Republican convention at Minneapolis. A contemporary concludes that there is no reason in the world why women might not have been regularly made presidential electors and we look for that distinction, great as it will be and even revolutionary as it may appear in some men's estimation, to be accorded them four years hence. If they are good enough to participate in the choice of electors of President and Vice-President, they are surely good enough to be electors themselves. This is speaking politically, observe you; in a general way, their goodness is not a subject requiring affirmation. The governor of Wyoming, in a late message, gives an emphatic "me too" to that declaration, and adds that he likes the way the women vote there, which may mean that a good many of them voted for him.

AN ADMIRABLE SLOT INVENTION.

Our impulsive and somewhat volatile foreign friends, the French, lead the world in a great many things—in none more so than in their regulations and devices for supplying the poor with the necessary conveniences of life at the minimum of cost. As a rule French financiers and speculators are among the most daring of their usually conservative class; and no scheme that offers a fair show of moderate returns on the investment—especially where the advancement of national prestige or the promotion of the popular welfare is likely to be subserved—need long go without the requisite funds to put it into operation.

One is newly reminded of these praiseworthy characteristics by the successful inauguration of a plan for supplying Paris with hot water fountains. The subject was proposed some time ago and it met from the first with favorable consideration. The means to carry it into effect were accordingly forthcoming; and word now comes that a number of fountains are already in working order and giving good satisfaction. The process is not intricate at all. An automatic machine is used, to which the water is conducted by means of subterranean pipes. It runs through a coiled up copper tubing three hundred feet long, and is heated during its progress through this by gas, which is turned on by a sou turned into the slot, which amount furnishes eight liters, rather more than seven quarts. The convenience of this arrangement, and its economy, to the poorer classes, will be readily understood by those who realize how much of a luxury fuel is to such residents of the French capital as have to restrict their living expenses within the limits of a very meager income.

THE "WILDCAT" CURRENCY SCARE.

The question of a circulating medium for the facilitation of traffic among mankind, is one that our advanced civilization and improved conditions have failed to successfully cope with; by this we do not mean that the currency system is a failure or that we have no adequate purchasing agency, but that the question of what should be used and to what extent, is still an open one. It is shown that the money issued by the general government has not sufficient elasticity of volume, and that it thus does not meet the requirements of a good circulating medium; that it is easy to issue but difficult to get back; and that Congress is ever ready to issue more but never willing to make the amount outstanding any less. This is pointed to by contractionists as an artificial means of keeping the volume of money equal to the demands of trade, but they claim that its plain and logical result is inflation and uncertainty.

The currency question figured largely in the late campaign, being brought out conspicuously by James G. Blaine's arraignment of the plank in the Democratic platform calling for the repeal of the tax on state bank issues. This was seized upon by the Republicans as an evidence that the former party favored a return to the local currency prevalent before the war, and which was variously nicknamed, but most generally called "wildcat money," "shipplasters," etc.; at least they claimed that it was such evidence, and even flooded the country with caricatures of bank bills containing a picture of Cleveland and a wildcat, the object being to influence voters against the alleged financial policy of the Democratic party. Of course the scheme had but little effect; practically it had none at all, not because the people are not afraid of an unstable or baseless currency, but because they did not believe that the Democracy contemplated anything of the kind.

The plank referred to was the work of Hon. Michael D. Harter, one of the most persistent and stringent advocates of a sound currency in the whole country. He carries his views in this regard to such an extent that he advocates nothing but gold as a standard of values, with everything that issues in the shape of a circulating medium convertible into gold at the pleasure of the holder; silver he would treat as so much metallic merchandise, having no monetary value only to the extent that it is interchangeable, dollar for dollar, with the other coinage. Of course we of the West and a goodly number in the other parts of the country don't agree with him, insisting upon it as we do that silver is as royal a metal as gold and is intrinsically entitled to be an independent circulating medium; but no matter as to that. The point is, would a man with such views as Mr. Harter has, and possessing his abilities and experience as a publicist, be likely to so stultify—we might say belittle—himself as to favor an experimental or questionable currency of any kind? It is idle to think so.

The issues of state banks are payable, in effect, so many certificates of deposit good to the holder for the amount expressed on the face in current money of the United States. The only uncertainty which the holder would seem to be justified in feeling with regard to such issues, would be as to the stability, ability and honesty of the bank from whence it came; if they acquired sufficient circulation the people would thus of course become involuntary partners in a banking business, but why not? With the ability to draw their investments at any time or to assign them without formality on any occasion, what function of coined money is wanting? Indeed, it is more convenient than coin, for the reason that large amounts can be carried on the person without inconvenience or exposure; and when to this is added safety and security, certainly nothing better could be asked. The issues of the government itself rest on a similar basis—its ability to redeem in coin and its willingness to do so on demand; with these firmly settled there are no such demands, the people as a rule would rather have the paper.

This brings us to the question proper—the taxation of state bank issues. It being a settled thing that taxation is a vexation and that in whatever form it is imposed it is in one way or another, at a time or another, paid by the people, the question arises as to what extent the taxing power should be used. This has just been settled by what appears to be more than half a million majority in favor of the proposition that such power shall be exercised no further than the needs of the government economically administered actually require. When there is war or any other great national calamity upon the land, there must be increased taxation and other burdens imposed; in order to meet the increased expenditures; but when peace prevails and the needs of the government are few and light, the imposition of a tax in any form or for any purpose beyond enough to pay the bills, is just cause for complaint if not resistance; carried too far it assumes the form of robbery perpetrated for its own sake, not for any lawful or reasonable purpose at all. The Democrats in convention assembled, arrayed themselves against such procedure, declaring that customs dues must be scaled and all forms of taxation reduced until the government's income and its legitimate outlay were equal or as nearly so as practicable, thus forestalling the accumulation of a surplus inclining to extravagance and inviting corruption. Regarding the taxation of state bank issues as a measure of expense to the people among whom such money circulates, without increasing their security or aiding in the least to its adequacy, the party, to be consistent with its professions, was compelled to demand the repeal of the law under which such tax is levied. In the Democratic view, it seemed as if the remedy against an insecure and hazardous circulating medium was in the people themselves, at least, so far as local issues are concerned; such issue would not be in circulation if they did not consent to it; and being willing to have it and use it, it seemed unreasonable that they should have to pay for the privilege—a payment which, it is claimed, amounts simply to a fine when the one who pays it has committed no offense.

It must be confessed that those who saw and realized the issue as defined by Mr. Blaine, and who know by recollection or study the grievous inconveniences and injuries of the iniquitous state bank notes of various and uncertain value in the old days before the war, had cause to be strengthened in their fears by Mr. Cleveland's absolute silence on the question in his letter of acceptance and the evasion of the various Democratic orators. It is no doubt a fact that they found it a difficult subject to handle and one they would have preferred to see kept in abeyance. Nevertheless, its enunciation in Chicago was in strict accordance with the Democratic doctrine of state sovereignty, and cannot purely be viewed as inconsistent; while the circumstances of its introduction ought to have a tendency to allay the anxieties of those who regard it as a menace to our currency. The News, which is neither an apologist nor accuser of the Democratic or the Republican party, and certainly is not the mouthpiece of any party, merely presents in the foregoing an explanation of what was meant by the financial plank in the platform of the first named organization. That it could not reasonably bear a "wildcat" construction seems to be the verdict of the people of the country, and with that all will have to rest contented, for a while at least.

A GREAT DECISION.

The News today surrenders considerable space to a lengthy, profound and most important decision given in the Territorial Supreme Court this morning by Chief Justice Zane. It forms a notable link in the chain of litigation that has come to be commonly known as the "Church cases," and is in effect a decision as to the objects to which the personal property of the Church, in the hands of the receiver, shall be devoted. It takes into consideration the report of Master in Chancery Loofbourov, and exhaustively reviews and passes upon the same. In all respects it is a weighty and valuable document, and it forms an important contribution to the legal literature of the country. Lack of time and space preclude any detailed review of it in these columns today, but it is earnestly commended in its entirety to the careful perusal of every reader.

AN ALARMING REPORT.

A telegram in today's News announces that a German paper, the Kreuz Zeitung, publishes a report that the Russians are massing troops on the frontier line dividing the two countries. Nothing more disquieting to the German mind than this could be issued, except, perhaps, an actual declaration of war. In view of the more or less unsettled state in which European affairs have been for several years, such a report as that spoken of is almost as bad as throwing a lighted match into a powder magazine; there may be no explosion, but it will be a narrow escape. It is quite possible that the German Emperor wants some palliative agency for the enormous military budget placed before the people to keep them quiet, and if that is the case he could not have devised a more careful scheme than having one of the papers publish such news as that telegraphed. It may, however, be true, in which case it is time to look out for squalls if for nothing more serious.

ENDED WITHOUT TROUBLE.

Another of the great strikes which have become so numerous of late years has come to an adjustment; the dissatisfied street car employees of New Orleans returned to work yesterday and business in the Crescent city, which was seriously threatened and measurably impaired for a time, has resumed its wonted conditions. There was no little excitement occasioned for a time by the rumor which got out and spread that Pickertons had been sent for and were on the way; but this was at once authoritatively and emphatically denied, his avoiding much trouble, perhaps bloodshed. This is particularly gratifying to all advocates of peace and good order, as well as to those who have no love for the men who engage in the business of shooting for a detective agency. One such scene as that at Homestead last summer is enough for a generation at least.

DEMONSTRATIVE JOURNALISM.

The tendency of political journals to convert their pages into barayards on paper whenever their party is successful in an election, is as largely and enjoyably engaged in now as it ever was. The custom is not particularly objectionable, since the tendency of the age is to be demonstrative; but there is not enough emphasis in type of large size judiciously arranged to convey all the exultation which mute figures are capable of. The Cleveland Plain Dealer is ahead of anything yet received in the direction spoken of; the first page is bordered all around with roosters of different sizes, all crowing as if their throats if not their hearts would break, while in the center is a finely arranged, excellent picture of Cleveland and Stevenson. The paper was looked at by a good many and was the occasion of considerable merriment. Such productions will string along for several days now, then they will disappear as suddenly as they came.

AS TO DREAMS.

Every one has noticed that some people have a habit which at times becomes annoying, of relating what they dreamed the night before, the degree of annoyance experienced by the listener being lessened or increased or even removed as the recital is interesting or otherwise; and the frequency or infrequency of the occurrence, together with the dreamer's descriptiveness and the regard he has for him (or her), having much to do with it. There are occasions when the victim of these well-meant but usually tiresome narrations—since they as a rule possess neither interesting nor amusing features—wishes his persecutor almost any mild form of mental penance commensurate with the aggravated nature of the case. Yet a general disregard for dreams, or a spirit of ridicule in thinking of or listening to them, is not to be recommended. As a matter of fact there is scarcely one, even among the most prosaic and unimaginative, who can be said to be wholly free from interest in the subject.

For, let it be remembered, there are dreams and dreams. There are those which have a distinct significance, sometimes beyond the ken of the dreamer, though at times their meaning will dawn upon the understanding as soon as Morpheus has relaxed his grasp. Others are a hotch-potch of absurdities. In some instances they come as an inspiration, a warning or a comfort; in others they are the result of a disordered stomach. Scientists say the sleep that is dreamless is the natural repose—that it is of this form the poets sing when they refer to the balmy sleep that is tired nature's sweet restorer. Yet who would forego the exquisite pleasure that comes like a breath from another and a holier world in the form of dreams of a blissful reunion with loved ones, of exalted encouragement in the stern battle of life, of gentle instruction in the duty that lies before? Who is there that at some time in his life has not received benefit or strength from these mysterious, uncontrollable, unexplained visions of the night?

A notable instance of dreaming to advantage and thus saving the lives of several persons, was recently related to Dr. Horace Bushnell, author of "Nature and the Supernatural," and by him has been given to the public. Many years ago, in a mild winter night, Captain Yant, now a patriarch of Napa Valley, Cal., had a dream in which he saw what appeared to be a company of emigrants arrested by the snows of the mountains and perishing rapidly by cold and hunger. He noted the very onset of the scenery, marked by a huge, perpendicular front of white rock cliffs; he saw men cutting off what appeared to be tree tops rising out of deep gulches of snow; he distinguished the very features of the persons and the look of their particular distress. He awoke profoundly impressed by the distinctness and apparent reality of the dream. He at length fell asleep and dreamed exactly the same dream over again.

It might here be proper to observe parenthetically that when a dream is repeated, especially in the same night, there is generally something more than imagination or chance to it; and it proved to be so in this case. Yant was unable to shake off the impression produced, and falling in shortly afterward with an old hunter comrade he told history, and was only the more deeply impressed by his recognizing without hesitation the scenery of the dream. This comrade came over the Sierra, by the Carson Valley pass, and declared that a spot in the pass answered exactly his description. By this he was decided. He immediately collected a company of men with mules and blankets and all necessary provisions. The neighbors laughed at his credulity, but that did not deter him in the least; and the two men led the line of march for the scene pictured in Dreamland. They found it exactly as shown and a company of perishing emigrants in the situation described; those who were alive were rescued and brought into civilization.

Who knows but what, in the instance here referred to, one of the spirits which had taken flight from its mortal tabernacle amid the snow was permitted to seek out a fit confidant on earth and communicate to him the condition of the suffering camp, realizing that he was the kind of man who would act upon the information thus conveyed? Who knows, indeed, but what when death's counterfeit is upon us we sometimes, in spirit, visit scenes and see objects and mingle with beings invisible with our mortal vision? Opaque to the natural eye is the veil that separates us from the Beyond, but it is a thin veil for all that. May it not perhaps be more readily pierced when, oblivious to all carnal distractions and influences, we are wrapped in slumber? Verily there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in man's philosophy!

THE LADIES of Minnesota propose to erect a bronze effigy of Minnehaha, and the ladies of Virginia are preparing for a statue of Pocahontas, at the World's Fair. "Fair," in this connection, may not be said to refer strictly to complexion.

MEMORIAL SERVICES.

The special services held in the Tabernacle yesterday morning on the occasion of the burial of Elder David Hoagland Cannon, son of President George Q. Cannon, in memory of all the missionaries who have died while engaged in the mission field, were of a very unique and impressive character. The congregation was one of the largest ever seen within the walls of the spacious building, not only the floor, but every available space in the galleries being filled.

Among those present were many persons belonging to the various religious denominations in the city. The entire front of the stand, extending from gallery to gallery, was draped with white crape, as was also a portion of the organ, while upon the ledges of the stand as well as around the structure were a number of magnificent shrubs, flowering plants and palms. At either end of the sacrament table—which was likewise covered with white crape—large bunches of pampas plumes were placed, and between these the casket, flanked by numerous floral tributes, rested during the service. The whole of the seats on the floor in the center of the building were reserved for the mourners—the bereaved ones who had lost relations under circumstances similar to those of the family of President Cannon. The two front benches on the north side were occupied by the Utah University cadets, who wore their regimental dress; President Cannon and his family were seated immediately behind the casket, at the foot of the speaker's stand.

The funeral cortege left the Farm, the residence of the deceased's father, at ten o'clock, and was met at the Tabernacle gates by the University cadets, of whom the late Elder Cannon was formerly a member. Through the battalion's open ranks the casket was borne, and they followed it into the building; at the conclusion of the services they preceded the remains with measured tread, to the south gate where the procession formed.

While the mourners were taking their places Prof. J. J. Daynes played a selection of solemn music upon the organ.

The services were conducted by Apostle Franklin D. Richards, under the direction of President Wilford Woodruff, and there were among those also on the stand: President Joseph F. Smith (of the First Presidency), Apostles Moses Thatcher, John Henry Smith, F. M. Lyman, Heber J. Grant, and Counselors Joseph E. Taylor and Charles W. Penrose.

The solemn ceremonies began with the choir singing the hymn on page 396, the opening verse of which is:

Cease, ye fond parents, cease to weep,
Let grief no more your bosom swell;
For what is death? 'Tis nature's sleep;
The trumpet of God will break the spell,
For He, whose arm is strong to save,
Arose in triumph o'er the grave.

Prayer was offered by Apostle F. M. Lyman.

The choir sang the hymn on page 247:

When shall we all meet again?
When shall we our rest obtain?
When, our pilgrimage be o'er?
Fading sighs be known no more?

When Mount Zion we regain,
There we all may meet again.

PRESIDENT WILFORD WOODRUFF

Next arose and said as the funeral services on this occasion not only embraced the death of Brother David Hoagland Cannon, whose tabernacle now laid before the congregation, but a great many other Elders who had yielded up their lives while preaching the Gospel to the nations of the earth, an endeavor had been made to publish these cases as far as they had come to the knowledge of the authorities, and Apostle Richards would therefore read to those assembled the list already furnished. After this Brother Grant would read one of the last letters written home from abroad by the late David H. Cannon.

APOSTLE RICHARDS

explained that all the names in the list did not contain the same amount of information, the time having been too short to obtain as much as desired; but when more complete details came in they would be published. Brother Richards then read the list which appeared in Saturday's NEWS, and which appears, corrected, in another column.

APOSTLE HEBER J. GRANT

next read the last letter written by Elder David H. Cannon to his sister six days before his death.

The anthem, "Not dead, but asleep," was afterwards rendered most effectively by the members of the Tabernacle Harmony and Conductor's class.

The words were as follows:

They shall awake again in the presence of th living God.—Amen.

Mourn not, oh, weep not, for death has no power.
'Tis but a change to the angel's bright bow.

Christ on the cross suffered pain and death for us all.

'Tis not dead, but sleep; they shall awake
when the Father calls.

Come unto me all, I will give you rest.

For the Kingdom now is thine;

The Love of God is everywhere.

Glory to God. Glory now on high.

Weep not for the loved ones gone

For the soul can never die.

Not dead, but asleep. Amen.

PRESIDENT WILFORD WOODRUFF,

After quoting the words, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth, yea saith the Spirit, for they rest from their labors and their works do follow them," said those present had already heard quite as good a sermon as he himself could preach in the letter just read from their departed brother whose tabernacle was before them, and whose spirit had entered upon its mission on the other side of the veil. To President George Q. Cannon, his family, and the relatives of all those dead ones whose names had just been read in their hearing, he would say, if the veil were removed and they could see their departed ones in the spirit world, they would rejoice with every sentiment of their heart at having had the privilege of being the parents, brothers and sisters of those who had entered upon their labors and were at work therein today. He would not attempt on that occasion to talk about any of their brethren in particular who had left this sphere of action and entered upon their ministerial labors beyond. Those who died in the Lord hardly tasted of death. When the spirit left the body it entered into the presence of the righteous. There was a work on the other side of the veil belonging to this dispensation as well as to all others; and our Savior Himself spent but a very short time in the flesh—only three and a half years—after he began his ministry before He laid down His life, when He was crucified and His blood was shed for the redemption of the world. He then entered immediately upon His work, preaching to "the spirits in prison," and when His body was resurrected He ascended to His Father. The Savior's work had never ceased from that day until now. That was an example to all men under heaven who had received the Gospel of Jesus Christ, who had received the Priesthood and been called to labor for the salvation of the world.

He (the speaker) had listened to the reading of several letters from their departed brother, one of which had been read that morning. Those to his father concerning his mission were deeply interesting to them all, as showing the passion the deceased occupied, his great zeal, and his desire to save the souls of men. Brother Cannon's mission extended over but a few months, from the time he entered the Master's vineyard until his spirit left its tabernacle. But during that brief period he performed an excellent work; he opened a good many doors and brought souls into the Kingdom. The speaker thought that if those whose sons and daughters died in the Lord and were taken from among them could comprehend the work laid out for them by our heavenly Father, they would feel thoroughly satisfied. There was a great amount of work to be done on the other side of the veil by those who lived in the flesh and labored in this great work upon the earth from the time of Joseph Smith down to the present. Temple work for the dead was an important duty in which a good many of the Latter-day Saints were engaged, and more or less had to be done in this respect in every age when the Lord has a people on the earth. In these last days this same duty rested upon us. Our fathers who had died without a knowledge of the Gospel had gone into the spirit world, and we should labor for them here. This they would all learn when they, in their turn, reached the other side of the veil and the books were opened. A number of the Latter-day Saints were taken away in the prime of life, and sometimes it seemed that the very best of our boys on earth were called to depart hence. He did not know that they were actually better than those who were left; but certainly they had remained faithful to the end.

As to him whose tabernacle now laid before them, he felt that all was right. He was a good and faithful boy, a true Elder in Israel; he labored diligently in the Master's cause up to the last hour that he dwelt in the flesh, and he rejoiced today in the spirit world among the Lord's anointed, the righteous that dwell there. He felt that Brother George Q. Cannon and his family, the brothers and sisters of the deceased, and the relatives of all there who had been called to mourn the loss of their beloved ones, those who had died among the nations of the earth, had I cause to rejoice in that they continued faithful until called hence; and when the books were opened and we could understand these things right, it would be seen that the hand of the Lord was in it and that what He had done was in accordance with His mind and will.

In conclusion, President Woodruff said that the comforting influence of the Lord might rest down upon the sorrowing ones, until our bodies and spirits were reunited on the morning of the resurrection.

PRESIDENT JOSEPH F. SMITH

He did not feel that morning in the spirit of death nor in that of mourning, at rather in that of rejoicing. He felt gratitude to God our heavenly Father or His great mercy and loving-kindness towards us His children. Certainly we had no reason to mourn for Brother David Hoagland Cannon. His spirit is not mourn today, but rejoiced in the freedom which it had obtained, and in the glory and exaltation which he had acquired.

It was not at all strange that so many of our Elders had passed away from this stage of existence while broad in the missionary field. The wonder to him, indeed, was that out of the vast multitude of Elders who had sent out to preach the Gospel to the nations of the earth so very few of them had met with death in foreign lands, and it was, to himself, an evidence that the peculiar favor and blessing of the Almighty had been extended in a wonderful measure towards them, from the beginning of this latter-day work; it was remarkable that none of them had not fallen a prey to disease, hardship and the hand of the enemy.

We were all awaiting the time when, by one, we should pass behind the veil. When we considered that not one son or daughter of God who had been born in the flesh would escape the ordeal which was called death, we need not feel to mourn when the good and faithful, the true and noble of His children, were called hence. We would not call back the spirit of Brother David H. Cannon nor of those whose names have just been enumerated, and who had died in harness—in the service of God in the mission field, or in going to or returning from it. They had died in the discharge of their duty in faithfulness before the Lord—faithful to their trust, faithful to their covenants, and the reward of the faithful had been given unto them. It was true that our natural feelings were grieved at the departure of those whom we loved; it was natural that we should mourn over losing their presence and their society on earth; but when we knew that it was beyond our power to add one cubic to their stature in righteousness or to diminish aught in them—when we knew they had been faithful and were indeed the servants of God, and had died in His service, what more could we desire? If he could but know that his children would be permitted to lay down their lives as had Brother David H. Cannon and those other missionaries—in every particular the same—how much preferable would that be to him than to feel that any one of them should be suffered to deny the truth and depart from the way of life and salvation.

With himself there was no question as to the truth of this Gospel, in the advocacy and promulgation of which these their brethren had died—no doubt in regard to the divinity of this work. He was satisfied in his heart and mind that it was of God, that there was no greater work in which a man could engage and none more worthy of the sacrifice of our natural life or the time and ability which God had given us. These Elders had laid down their lives while seeking to bring mankind to a knowledge of the truth as restored to the earth in this dispensation; and he thanked God they had been permitted to do this in His service. All was well with them, and might our Heavenly Father grant unto us the same spirit which animated the late Brother Cannon while upon his mission. May the same spirit that was breathed in his communication to his sister, take possession of the hearts and minds of our young men and women in Zion. No higher, no more noble spirit or aspiration could possibly animate their souls than was breathed in that one letter, written just previous to his death. If we could only possess that spirit and be actuated by it, all would be well with us whether in life or in death. He thanked God that young men like Brother David Hoagland Cannon had been raised up in the midst of this people, and he prayed that the same spirit which he manifested and the same faith which he obtained from God might be given in great abundance to the children of Zion and to His people throughout the length and breadth of the land; because he did know that it was the Spirit of God, the spirit of righteousness, of holiness, meekness and truth, the spirit of the Gospel of the Son of God.

May God bless and comfort those who have been deprived of the society of a loved son and a loved brother, may peace and consolation dwell in their hearts, and be poured upon them in rich abundance, and may they rejoice in the great and glorious principles of the Gospel for which he laid down his life as a sacrifice. May we emulate his example and follow in his footsteps, live the life he has lived, and accomplish as much good as he has accomplished while we remain in the flesh, and as much more as it may be possible.

APOSTLE FRANKLIN D. RICHARDS

was the next speaker. He said he felt as though, more or less, he were this morning in the presence of those departed ones whose names he had before read to the congregation. The services on that occasion were in condolence with their worthy brother, President George Q. Cannon, and his household, as well as with the relatives of other missionaries who had died while laboring in the Lord's vineyard abroad, in their bereavement; but as President Joseph F. Smith had expressed it, they felt not to sorrow under such circumstances but rather to rejoice.

It was not his intention to take up the time of the meeting with any lengthened remarks of his own; he wished, however, to read an extract from a sermon preached by the Prophet Joseph Smith on April 16th, 1843, just after receiving the news of the death of Elder Lorenzo D. Barnes, at Bradford, England, which occurred on December 20th, 1842. As reported by Willard Richards and Willford Woodruff, the Prophet said:

When I heard of the death of our beloved Brother Barnes, it would not have affected me so much if I had the opportunity of burying him in the land of Zion.

I believe those who have buried their friends here, their condition is enviable. Look at Jacob and Joseph in Egypt, how they required their friends to bury them in the tomb of their fathers. See the expense which attended the embalming and the going up of the great company to the burial.

It has always been considered a great calamity not to obtain an honorable burial; and one of the greatest curses the ancient Prophets could put on any man was, that he should go without a burial.

I have said, Father, I desire to die here among the Saints. But if this is not thy will, and I go hence and die, wilt thou find some kind friend and bring my body back, and gather my friends who have fallen in foreign lands, and bring them up hither, that we may all lie together.

I will tell you what I want. If tomorrow I shall be called to lie in yonder tomb, in the morning of the resurrection let me strike hands with my father, and cry, "My father," and he will say, "My son, my son," as soon as the rock rends and before we come out of our graves.

And may we contemplate these things so? Yes, if we learn how to live and how to die. When we lie down we contemplate how we may rise up in the morning; and it is pleasing for friends to lie down together, locked in the arms of love, to sleep, and awake in each other's embrace, and renew their conversation.

Would you think it strange if I relate what I have seen in vision in relation to this interesting theme? Those who have died in Jesus Christ may expect to enter into all that fruition of joy, when they come forth, which they possessed or anticipated here.

So plain was the vision, that I actually saw men, before they had ascended from the tomb, as though they were getting up slowly. They took each other by the hand; and said to each other, "My father, my son, my mother, my daughter, my brother, my sister." And when the voice calls for the dead to arise, suppose I am laid by the side of my father, what would be the first joy of my heart? To meet my father, my mother, my brother, my sister; and when they are by my side, I embrace them, and they me.

It is my meditation all the day, and more than my meat and drink, to know how I shall make the Saints of God comprehend the visions that roll like an overflowing surge before my mind.

Oh! how I would delight to bring before you visions which you never thought of! But poverty and the cares of the world prevent. But I am glad I have the privilege of communicating to you some things, which, if grasped closely, will be a help to you when earthquakes bellow, the clouds gather, the lightning flash, the storms are ready to burst upon you like peals of thunder. Lay hold of these things, and let not your knees or joints tremble, nor your hearts faint; and then what can earthquakes, wars, and tornadoes do? Nothing. All your losses will be made up to you in the resurrection, provided you continue faithful. By the vision of the Almighty I have seen it.

The expectation of seeing my friends in the morning of the resurrection cheers my soul and makes me bear up against the evils of life. It is like their taking a long journey, and on their return we meet them with increased joy.

Hosanna, hosanna, hosanna to Almighty God, that rays of light begin to burst forth upon us, even now. I cannot find words to express myself. I am not learned, but I have as good feelings as any man.

O that I had the language of the archangel to express my feelings once to my friend! But I never expect to in this life. When others rejoice, I rejoice; when they mourn, I mourn.

Apostle Richards went on to remark that when on his second mission to England in the year 1850 permission was obtained to exhume the body of Brother Barnes and also that of Brother Wm. Burton, who died at Edinburgh, Scotland, on March 17th, 1851, and the missionaries having contributed the necessary funds they were brought to Salt Lake for interment in the midst of God's people. The bodies of quite a number of other Elders who had died abroad since then had also been brought over for the same purpose. An application, however, for permission to exhume and bring home the remains of Brother Flanigan from Birmingham, England, was met with a refusal. He had died of smallpox, and the authorities deemed it prudent not to run the risk of any possible spread of the contagion.

The Prophet Joseph Smith entertained the deepest interest in having the remains of the brethren who died abroad buried in the land of Zion—the gathering place of the Saints, and had a vault constructed in which it was his intention to have the bodies of the members of his own family deposited. This was erected on the south side of the Temple Square in the city of Nauvoo. While visiting that place, however, a few years ago, Brother Richards said he found the vault itself was still preserved intact, but it had been covered in and was then used as a wine cellar.

He thought the remarks made by the Prophet Joseph in the sermon to which he had just before referred were equally as consoling today to President Cannon and his family as they were to the friends of Brother Barnes at that distant time. Everything contained in the Holy Gospel was calculated to give us comfort and to cheer our hearts in the tribulations of this mortal life. We needed the Lord's strength to overcome all the trials and sorrows of these latter days. Some five or six of our missionaries had been buried in the mighty deep, but the day was coming, as we were told, when the sea shall deliver up its dead. Some of the Elders while engaged in preaching the Gospel had been persecuted, while others had been shot down by the assassin; but these would wear the martyr's crown in the Master's kingdom and would receive a full recompense at His hands. The crown of the Gospel martyr was the most glorious and brilliant that could be obtained, and there was no man who had laid down his life in God's service but would find his full reward in the world to come—life everlasting. The joy and gladness to be found in the holy Gospel should lift us above the momentary afflictions of this evil world, and if we but realized this more clearly than we did, we should not be nearly so downhearted as we sometimes were. The powers of darkness were permitted to crowd around us in order that our faith might be tested by God. He prayed the Lord to dispense His gracious blessings upon the mourners there that day, and prepare us all for the society hereafter of those noble ones who had already laid down their lives in His cause, from the day of the Prophet Joseph until now.

The choir sang the anthem, "Prayer," the words of which are here given:

[SOLO.]

When thy soul is sad and weary,
Seek relief in prayer;
When the way is dark and dreary,
Still there's comfort there.

There's a healing balm that prayer
Can alone impart;
And a comfort sent from heaven
To the seeking heart.

When thy dearest hope is blighted,
Like the autumn flowers;
And despair takes hold upon thee
In thy trying hour;

And in vain thou lookest round thee
For some friendly aid;
Turn to heaven in supplication;
Ask, nor be afraid.

Then a heavenly consolation
Will relieve the heart
Of its burden of vexation,
And its aching smart.

And thy trust in God will lighten
All thy deep despair;
While day by day through life will brighten
By the aid of prayer.

The solo was feelingly sung by Brother H. S. Ensign, Jr. Both the words and music of this selection are by Brother Evan Stevens.

The benediction was pronounced by Apostle John Henry Smith.

This concluded the services in the Tabernacle, which occupied just two hours. The congregation, by request, remained seated until all the mourners had emerged from the building.

The interment took place at the city cemetery, the dedicatory prayer at the grave being offered by President Joseph F. Smith. There was an immense concourse of spectators, and the sidewalk along South Temple street for a number of blocks was also lined with people. The funeral cortege, en route to the cemetery, was headed by the Utah University cadets, who walked four deep. When near the place of burial the ranks were parted and the whole procession passed through.

The casket containing the body of their deceased comrade was conveyed upon the undertaker's wagon, in the same manner in which it was brought from the Cannon residence to the Tabernacle, it being too large to admit of accommodation within the ordinary hearse. It was very massive and of elaborate workmanship, weighing nearly 500 pounds.

Eight brothers of the deceased acted as pall-bearers. These included Elder Hugh J. Cannon, who accompanied the remains from Germany. Bishop N. A. Empey and assistants had direction of the seating of the audience in the Tabernacle, and of the funeral procession; and Joseph E. Taylor was the undertaker in charge.

IN PAYSON.

Memorial Services for the Late Elder Adolf Haag.

Memorial services were held yesterday in Payson in honor of Elder Adolf Haag, who died on his mission to the orient. Addresses were made in the morning in the German and in the afternoon in the English language. There were large assemblies present at both meetings, of friends and relatives from Payson, Salt Lake City, Provo, Ogden and other places.

The first speaker in the morning was Elder C. C. Sobramm, who baptized Elder Haag. He gave a short history of the deceased's conversion to the Gospel, his emigration, ordination to the different grades of the Priesthood and his final call to the mission. Elder L. T. Moench dwelt on the virtues of the departed, his faithfulness in the work of the Lord and noble cause for which he laid down his life. Elder Arnold Schultness endorsed the remarks of the previous speakers. Elder Richard Haag related several touching incidents of the friendship and brotherly love which had united them in life.

In the afternoon memorial services were held in the Payson Tabernacle. The first speaker was Elder L. F. Moench. He was followed by Elders Arnold Schultness, Samuel Worcester, David Lant and C. C. Sobramm. The letter addressed to the First Presidency of the Church by Elder Don C. W. Muser, announcing Elder Haag's death was read. Many consoling remarks were made by the speakers mentioned. The fact was emphasized that the departed had shown himself willing to leave everything for the Gospel's sake, and that he died in the act of faithfully serving his Master.

Resolutions of respect were passed by the German branch over which he presided before he took his departure, and also by the Seventies' quorum of which he was a member.

A committee was also appointed to draft resolutions, expressing the appreciation of the people of Payson of the kindness and attention shown by the German consul and other authorities in Halle during the illness and funeral services of the deceased Elder.

NORMAL SUNDAY SCHOOL

PROVO CITY, Nov. 14.—The Normal Sunday school, notice of the organization of which by the General Superintendency of the Sunday School Union has already appeared in the NEWS, was inaugurated today in the Brigham Young Academy.

The rooms were well warmed and ventilated by the superior warm-air system of heating, and everything was clean, commodious and comfortable.

The congregation, composed of children, normal students, Sunday school teachers, visitors, the members of the faculty, and Sunday school authorities, assembled in room 4, and at 10 o'clock were called to order by Superintendent Benjamin Cluff, Jr.

On the stand were Elders George Goddard and George Reynolds, of the General Board of the Deseret Sunday School Union, President A. O. Smoot and Bishop J. E. Booth, of the Stake Board of Education, the members of the faculty, and a few prominent visitors.

Copies of the Sunday School Union song book had been distributed and the congregation sang "Beautiful Zion."

Elder Reynolds opened with prayer, invoking the blessings of heaven upon this "new departure."

"Did you think to pray," was then sung, and Brother Cluff arose and gave the following outline of the work designed in this department of the academy:

The school is divided into three grades, viz.—a Primary, an Intermediate and a Higher. Over each grade there will be placed a head-teacher, and as many assistants chosen as may be necessary, the design being not to give more than about ten pupils to one teacher. Normal students will be present at the recitations of the classes as observers of the methods of teaching, and these in their turns will be chosen to conduct classes (Here the Normals present were divided into classes of observers for each grade.)

Each grade will have three sub-grades or classes as follows:

PRIMARY.

(a) Stories from the Bible with charts.

(b) Stories from Book of Mormon with charts.

(c) The Primary Leaflets.

INTERMEDIATE.

(a.) Readings from the Old and New Testament.

(b.) Reading from the Book of Mormon with dictionary.

(c.) Study of Leaflets.

HIGHER.

(a.) A Study of Principles as arranged in Compendium.

(b.) Reading of Orson Pratt's and similar works.

(c.) Normal Instruction: Theory of Teaching adapted to Sunday School work.

Following are officers: Superintendent, B. Cluff Jr. Assistant Superintendent, Geo. H. Brimhall. Musical Director, H. E. Gliese. Head teachers, Higher Grade, N. L. Nelson; Intermediate Grade, Walter M. Wolfe; Primary Grade, Miss Amy Brown. Librarian, Edward Holt.

The daily program will be as follows:

9:30-10:15—Lecture on Teaching.

10:15-10:30—Intermission.

10:30-11—Opening exercises and administration of the Sacrament.

11-11:50—Class exercises in the various rooms.

11:50-12—Closing exercises.

Brother Cluff announced that the musical director would spend every Sunday ten minutes in each grade in teaching songs appropriate to the age of pupils. Singing would be specially emphasized.

The last remark pleased Supt. Goddard, who now arose to address the meeting. He had been connected twenty-five years with Sunday school work. No prouder or nobler position could be held by any man or woman than that of teacher and especially teacher in a Sabbath school. Weighty results had been accomplished in the past with inadequate facilities. What might not be hoped for in the future, now that he had lived to witness the organization of a school, especially for the training of Sunday school teachers. He congratulated the young people before him and asked God's blessing on the new movement.

Brother Goddard was brimming over with the joy of being a Latter-day Saint, and as usual did not fail to communicate happiness to others.

Brother Reynolds stated that this movement had the fullest approval and support of the general authorities, and much would be expected from this school in systematizing and harmonizing the work throughout Zion.

Pres. Smoot declared that no greater or more glorious feature had been or could be added to the work of the B. Y. Academy. He thanked God that the work had been begun, and promised it all his influence. It cannot fail to do great good in Zion.

"Brother Goddard has just told us" began Elder James E. Daniels, "that President Brigham Young, wishing to begin an important home industry, called him from the position of leading merchant in this city, to the humiliating office of paper-rag gatherer. He obeyed, and I think did well to obey. If the office did not confer honor on him, he conferred honor on the office. God has since rewarded him sufficiently in the position he now holds. I cannot help thinking that Brother Goddard's experience finds a parallel in the cases of early Sunday school teachers as compared with the present or at least future teachers in this great cause. Twenty-five years ago it was hardly considered an honor to be a teacher in a Sabbath school. It was generally thought men conferred honor on the office. I distinctly remember how President Smoot wishing to elevate this popular feeling, consented, in addition to his numerous other duties, to become our superintendent. Since then what a stride forward we have taken. No man can now, in the estimation of the people confer honor on any office in a Sunday school. At any rate if this is not fully true today, it will be when such schools as the one opened here today shall have had their full influence."

Superintendent M. H. Hardy, of the M. I. Association, pledged the new move all the support in his power, and the countenances of all present reflected back the worthy sentiment.

The grades now went to the various rooms for class organization and informal instructions. On reassembling many other good things were said, but enough has been reported to convey the general spirit, purpose and prospects of this new organization.

N. L. N., Secretary.

RELIGIOUS CONGRESSES.

[BY J. M. S.]

One of the grandest conceptions of the age will be embodied in the series of religious conferences to be held in Chicago in connection with the World's Fair next year. They are part of the organization known as the Auxiliary Congress, which is under the management of the directors of the Columbian Exposition and comprise conferences of the leading men of the world interested in agriculture, engineering, commerce and finance; education, philosophy, literature; philanthropy, reform, temperance; municipal, national and international laws, peace arbitration, jurisprudence; labor problems; medicine, music, architecture, and other arts, and finally religion. It is safe to say, that of all the brilliant assemblages that will be gathered for the discussion of the various subjects here enumerated, none will surpass in popular interest those that will gather in the interest of religion.

The religious congresses are to comprise, first, a great parliament with representatives of all the religions of the world. Here Christians and Jews, Mohammedans and Hindoos, Brahmans and Confucians are to fraternize in the friendly exchange of thoughts and ideas. Second, a Christian congress composed of members of the various denominations that profess to follow the great Nazarene. Here, Roman Catholics, Greek, Orthodox, Armenians, Lutherans, Baptists, Episcopalians, Methodists, Presbyterians, etc. etc. will be represented. Third, between twenty-five or thirty special conferences of different churches. There will thus be a Catholic conference, a Baptist conference, a Presbyterian conference and so on. There will further be great conferences of various missionary organizations and an international session of the Evangelic Alliance. In brief, there will be such an exhibition of religious thought that probably never before entered into the mind of man as a possibility.

And all this is no wild project, no pie in the sky, but a conception to be realized in a near future. As soon as the plan was mentioned it met with hearty response all over the world. The great prelates of the Catholic church responded cordially. Protestants became eager and enthusiastic and even Jewish rabbis expressed their willingness to take part in the programme. A marvelous phenomenon. Can it be that the world at last has become conscious of its helpless condition and is willing to investigate the possibility of saving the various fragments of its religion from total destruction? Has the time come for the "warriors of the cross" to transform their swords into implements of peace, preparatory to the dawning of the day of universal brotherhood?

The purpose of these religious gatherings is stated to be a friendly exchange of opinions. There will be no debates of controversial or polemic nature. No denominations will be expected to abor-don't peculiarities. Each will have a fair opportunity of stating through its representatives, its position on the various questions. The meetings will be of the same tenor as those of the Evangelic Alliance, only on a vastly larger scale.

It is not strange that the various protestant bodies should embrace the opportunity with enthusiasm, for it is the very nature of Protestantism to court investigation and discussion. It is apparently more strange that the Catholics should be in favor of meeting their adversaries in such a congress. Exceptions have been taken by some ardent followers of that faith to the whole plan on the supposition that "there will be no harmony of thought" and that "truth" will suffer by the "juxta-position of error." To which Archbishop Ireland in his dedicatory speech with admirable clearness of perception answers:

"There is no force in the remark. The vital perennial truths regarding the supreme God will be confessed by all. The proclamation of these truths will be a great gain. Beyond this those who believe they possess the truth need not fear. Truth should not be timid. Rather should she court publicity on this as on all other occasions, in order that she be known and loved. There shall be no discussions, no controversies. The purpose shall be to show forth in methods of peace what are the professions of faith and the religious works of the world at the present time. From the plans of the department of religion of the congress auxiliary might but good results can follow."

It may be presumed that the prelate in speaking of "truth" refers particularly to the doctrines of the Roman church; that his aim is to allay the fears of those, who are concerned about the victory of Romanism. In other words, the Archbishop holds, that his church need not fear an open proclamation of her doctrines. Romanism is able to hold its own in the midst of an exhibition of the world's religions.

This may be startling to those who possibly think that the Roman Catholic theology is only a net of absurdities and superstitions. But these are wrong and the Archbishop is right. His church to-day is the strongest of the churches of the world, not only numerically but also in other respects.

The exponents of Romanism count in their ranks some of the leading intellects of the age, and they have a system of theology which for apparent consistency, profundity and logical connection of the various links is unexcelled. In brief, the theology of Rome is as perfect as mere human wisdom, guided by the experience of centuries, can make it. And it is at all times open to improvement. Rome claims apparently with much force to have divine authority, derived through an unbroken chain of succession from the first Apostles of our Lord. Rome has a cult which, with its gorgeously attired clergy, imposing ceremonies of alleged worship, its magnificently ornamented sacred buildings and its splendid musical exercises appeals to the outward senses of its devotees, more than any other Christian religion. Rome takes in everything, makes use of everything for her own purposes. Through her benevolent institutions, the poor are reached. The wealthy are appealed to through the luxuries of the services. The philosopher is given some of the profoundest problems to solve in her theology. The civilized state is influenced by her subtle statesmen, and the savage tribes, by her missionaries. All pro Deo et ecclesie

In almost every one of these particulars, the Protestants are found wanting. As far as their theology goes, it is defective, even in its logic. The different parts do not fit, a fact which is best illustrated by the existence of broadly speaking—countless factions. Protestantism is really nothing but Romanism, broken to pieces, scattered, resolved into a chaotic condition, by the mighty forces which, at the time of the reformation, convulsed the northern parts of Europe. It is the result of a mighty social eruption, more destructive than creative, although necessary for the completion of the history of the world and the development of truth. Should it therefore come to a comparison—were Protestantism and Catholicism placed side by side, it would become apparent to any intelligent observer, that the former resembles the latter about just as much as Charleston after the earthquake resembled itself before the catastrophe.

This is perhaps more clearly visible in the ritual and the ordinances of Protestant denominations than in the doctrinal systems. What a striking similarity there is in the divine services, the formulated prayers, the confessions of faith, the administration of the sacraments, the uniforms of the clergy, and a dozen other things. And yet, how absolutely poor do the Protestants look compared to Rome. In some churches there is absolutely nothing to satisfy the æsthetic taste of the cultivated mind. Eloquence is an exception in many dusty pulpits, or what is worse, they are occupied by political demagogues. Music is represented by a discordant volume of sound competing with roaring organpipes, unless, as in some churches, there is no attempt at music at all. Sculpture is banished as suggestive of idolatry, and painting is scanty, if tolerated at all. The whole make-up is suggestive of the eagerness with which somebody tore things down without ability to build up. A comparison cannot fail to reveal this.

But where Protestantism is weakest, is in its utter disregard of divine authority. The position of the seceders from Rome in this regard is utterly absurd. Luther, himself, used to feel keenly, that he had undertaken a work for which he had no direct divine authority. But he consoled himself with the thought, that he had been regularly appointed to his ecclesiastical office by the church of Rome, which had the right to appoint. He tried to argue that this authority once conferred upon him could not be taken away, and that he, consequently, always had it. But at other times, he saw that the same church that had conferred the priesthood on him had the right to take it, and that this had actually been done, when he was dis-fellowshipped. At such times he used to argue that Rome, being a fallen church, had no authority to confer and no authority to take away; but that what he performed was done by authority of the books of the Bible. And this idea was adopted by Protestants as the safer one. And they claim to this day to have their sole authority in the Bible.

Here is where the absurdity becomes most glaring. The sacred volume records at least two different dispensations. Both claim equal importance; both are the works of God. But they have different scopes, different ordinances, different commandments.

Men who claim nothing but the Bible as their source of authority have these alternatives: They must either reject one dispensation and accept the other as the pattern of their faith and practices, or they must accept parts of both and reject parts of both, where the discrepancies are irreconcilable. This latter alternative has been chosen by the Protestants. They accept parts of the Old Testament and parts of the New, all the time trying to make people believe that they accept it all. Hence the miserable patch-work of religion known as Protestantism and hence the endless contentions among themselves, because no two bodies of "Christians," and, indeed, no two prominent individual theologians can agree between themselves about which patches to use and which to discard.

Romanism is not guilty of this absurdity. It believes in the Bible, but it believes also that theology like every science is progressive; that new facts can be discovered and old ones, better understood. It pretends to believe in the presence of the Divine Spirit who guides into all truth and requires its followers to accept as truth what the so-called infallible representative of the Almighty declares to be the truth. This ends the controversy. What the head of the church declares to be the doctrine of the church is accepted as such, whether it is found in so many words in the Bible, or only in tradition, or in the records of the ecumenical councils. This is authoritative and saves the church from a glaringly absurd position.

In a contest with Protestantism Rome must therefore, become victorious. It was not the intrinsic value of the reformation, that saved it from destruction in northern Europe. It was the victorious arms of the Swedish hero who gave his life for it at Lutzen. But for that, Germany would undoubtedly have shared the fate of France and Spain. It was, and still is, a contest between two equally false systems. Romanism is as radically wrong as Protestantism, but the former falsehood has the greater appearance of truth, to a casual observer at least; it has the more elegant surface. It is therefore more attractive to the multitude, and Archbishop Ireland can without fear state that "truth," as he sees it, has nothing to fear from a juxtaposition to "error."

From the oriental churches Romanism has much less to fear. As Protestantism is nothing but Romanism crushed to fragments, so the oriental churches are the Roman church in her various stages of infantile development. Rome progressed so fast in the early centuries on the path that led her astray that all her branches could not follow. They dropped off, one after another and each remains to this day very much as it was at the time of secession. They are powerless in a contest of this nature. In fact, the desire is growing in the orient for a reunion with the mother church.

Judaism is a religion of the past. Its mission in the history of the world will soon be accomplished. It is impotent in a contest of religions.

The only power to which not only Romanism but all other systems of religion must eventually give way is the power of God as manifested in His true Church. No doubt, the day is approaching, when the decisive contest shall stand between real truth and error. Perhaps the various churches and religions of the world must enter into some sort of alliance with each other for this last battle. Possibly, the thought that suggested the gathering of a universal congress of religions may lead to further preparations, for the struggle. Under all circumstances, it must be hailed with delight by those who believe in the final triumph of God's truth. Let the opposing forces prepare themselves. And let that preparation be the signal to the hosts of Jehovah to arm themselves with truth and faith, and then stand firm for the right, for, there is no doubt about it, Truth will prevail.

BEAR LAKE STAKE CONFERENCES.

The quarterly conference of the this Stake convened Nov. 5th and 6th.

In addition to the Stake Presidency and other local authorities, we had, as missionaries, Elder James Hardy of Provo and Elder James W. Paxman of Nephi, whose labors are devoted to our Sunday School interests.

The Bishop's reports indicated a healthy condition of the Stake, physically and spiritually.

Remarks were made by President Budge, Elders L. Ricks, A. Beck, Wm. Hymas and J. A. Stucki. Elders James Hardy and James W. Paxman delivered powerful and impressive discourses on the Sabbath School and its interests.

Elders Peter Beck and Peter McKinnon were chosen by the unanimous vote of the conference as missionaries in the interest of the Y. M. M. I. A. T. MINSON, Stake Clerk.

The Los Angeles chamber of commerce has on exhibition a 206-pound pumpkin and a 121 pound squash.

While John Harvey, a miner, was at work in a drift in the Louisville mine at Leadville, Col., he was caught by a mass of falling dirt or rock. Both legs were broken, skull fractured, upper and lower jaw broken.

GENERAL McCULLAN's autograph commands three dollars on the market and General Sherman's the same; but General Lee's is scarce and in relative demand at ten dollars—so we are informed. As a rule, Jay Gould's sig-

DR. WARNER, the corset-maker, withdrew from the Republican electoral ticket in Connecticut a few days before the election. This proceeding, so clearly calculated to unbrace the party of protection in the Nutmeg state, doubtless proved a corresponding stay to the opposition.

A gentleman was in town yesterday, says the Brigham Bugler, obtaining information for drawing a new insurance map of Brigham City, that it may be re-rated. It is thought the rate will be reduced twenty or twenty-five per cent and the reduction will probably take place about January 1st, 1898.

KATE FIELD, still drawing ludicrous comparisons between New York's and Chicago's way of celebrating Discovery Day, thinks she has found the reason why the one was a failure and the other a great success: "New York celebrated men, Chicago celebrated [women as well and hence] the human race."

It is amusing, now that result is known, to read the headlines in some of the Republican papers just before the fatal day. Here is the San Francisco Chronicle, for instance, announcing early on the morning of the 6th: "Victory in Sight—Joy among the Republican Leaders—Indications of Success Never Stronger," etc., etc.

THE FACT that an Eastern bicyclist is just now claiming notoriety for having traveled from New York to Chicago without expending a cent for food, lodging or transportation, suggests once more that in the case of some people there are occasions when it is cheaper to travel than to stay at home.

Last week a fight took place in John Richie's saloon in Suito between D. Cereola and Peter Bandoni, two Italians, over election matters and Cereola was stabbed four times under the left arm by Bandoni. The weapon used was a stiletto. The wounds are not considered dangerous.—Dallas (Nevada) Times.

Fred Ladd, a machinist helper, had a narrow escape from instant death at the shops yesterday. A timber was thrown from the top of one of the highest buildings as Ladd was passing beneath. The timber grazed Ladd's head and opened the scalp. Had it landed squarely the skull would have been crushed.—Cheyenne (Wyo.), Sun.

Mr. Blumenthal and son of Provo have been working on the new county jail this week. They have roofed it with iron roofing and Alfred Haycock is engaged in painting the roof. The iron coats have arrived, heating apparatus and all material which will be used in completing and entirely fitting up the jail.—Nephi Courier.

There are three immense potatoes, raised in Montana, and three very large lemons, raised in California, on exhibition in the window of the Cosmopolitan restaurant. The potatoes weigh, all together, a little over eleven pounds. On a card, stuck in the top potato, is printed this inscription: "Montana for Vegetable, California for Fruit and Helena for the Capital."—Helena Herald.

CONGRESSMAN BRECKINRIDGE appears to have a strange idea about a legislative lobby. He would make it such a lonesome and solitary place that a pretty girl could go there and let her best young man come in and kiss her without anybody finding it out. This would be an ideal state of things from several points of view; but it would not make the lobby as unpopular as Mr. Breckinridge would like to have it.

EVERY MORNING for the last ten days the Salt Lake Tribune has had an editorial on one subject or another beginning, "This is a time when the people ought to be doing some thinking." In view of the fate which overtook the Tribune's particular candidates, why can it not see the propriety of changing the phrase to: "We ask a moment's attention from the people who have been doing some thinking."

Hugh Williams, of Cheyenne, thinks he is about the best broncho buster in the country and has the money behind him to add force to the remark. He has challenged Frank Nott of Denver to a riding contest with Wyoming "out-jaws." In this city, the location and stakes to be named by the home party. By the rules Williams proposes each rider must mount his animal before they spring to their feet after being thrown, and, in fact, must do the solitary "busting" act after the most approved vaquero style.—Denver News.

Four deaths have been reported this week, says the Rock Spring (Wyo.) Miner, one from an accident in the coal mines; one from diphtheria, one from typhoid fever, and one from a cancer. "As there are other cases of diphtheria in the town, we have been requested to call the attention of the town council to the necessity of passing an ordinance for the better protection of our citizens against the spreading of this epidemic disease. An ordinance is in force relative to scarlet fever and smallpox and equal precautions should be enforced regarding diphtheria."

A sad accident occurred on the 11th inst., at Gunnison, Col., by which the youngest son of Captain E. W. Burton met a tragic death. Returning from a hunt, young Eddie Burton (aged 16) and his brother Claude were riding in a wagon and, when near town, the gun which Eddie was holding exploded and the charge entered his body just below the right shoulder. He had failed to remove the shell from the gun and the jolting of the wagon set off the charge. A hole three inches in diameter was torn through his chest, and a few minutes after the accident the lad was dead.

President Rodney Curtis of the Denver Tramway company appeared in Justice Talbot's court last week and paid a claim of 10 cents for disbursed transfers, together with $3 costs in the case. This action was brought by Judge Moses Hallet of the United States district court. He was a passenger on one of the tramway lines, receiving a transfer to another line. Upon presenting the transfer to the conductor, it was refused on the ground that the time for which it was good had expired. Mr. Curtis declined to contest the case, preferring to confer judgment and pay the costs.—Denver Street Railway Budget.

DISCOURSE

PRESIDENT JOSEPH F. SMITH,

Saturday, October 8, 1892, at the General Conference, held in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Utah.

[REPORTED BY ARTHUR WINTER.]

I pray for the guiding influence of the Holy Spirit to enable me, while I stand before you this morning, to speak the truth, and to do it in a manner that will be plain and simple, so that we can all understand. I am grateful to see the good attendance that we have had at our Conference thus far, and I am also thankful to our heavenly Father for the rich outpouring of His Spirit which we have enjoyed while we have been together. I hope that the good counsels and the excellent instructions which have been imparted to us may find ample lodgment in our hearts and in our memories, that we may profit by them. We have had a little said upon a variety of subjects, all of which are necessary for our guidance and for our observance in order that we may prosper and be what we should be—the people of God.

Brother John Henry Smith, in his closing remarks, touched upon a subject which is of vital importance to the Latter-day Saints, and that is, the subject of home employment and home industry. It should not be that any of our people are without employment in this country; and some efforts ought to be made by the leading men in the various settlements, where men are unemployed, to devise means by which employment may be given to them, that they may not be necessarily idle. In connection with this subject it may not be amiss to state at this time and in this congregation the fact that during the lifetime of President Young he was very earnest in his desires and efforts that home industries should be established among the people. I remember distinctly when he called upon President Smoot, Bishop R. T. Burton and others to unite their means together and build a woolen factory up here on Parley's canyon creek; and they did so. President Young himself also had a factory there about that time. I also remember that President Young called upon Brothers Lorin Farr, Fugley and others at one time to establish a woolen factory near Ogden, and they did so. I remember President Young was very eager that a factory should be established down in our "Dixie" country, and certain brethren were called and commissioned to go down there to establish a factory in that vicinity. Then he was very anxious that employment should be given to some of our people in the direction of planting, cultivating and raising cotton, and people were called and sent into our "Dixie" country to raise cotton, in order that the factory established at Washington might not be idle, and that cotton might be produced by the labor of our Utah people.

Yesterday I was in the Fair, where I saw some excellent specimens of cotton that had been raised in the south, and prepared as batting, by the industry of our people. I saw a very fine display of woolen goods—flannels, blankets, and other cloths—marked "John C. Cutler, agent for the Provo Woolen Mills," and my eyes were gladdened by the sight, my heart was rejoiced to see such a fine display of home products exhibited at the Fair. I believe in this kind of industry. I believe it to be a good thing for any community, to branch out in every kind of industry that will give employment to the people, and that will produce at home every article needed for home consumption, as far as possible. It is the principle upon which communities become self-sustaining, independent and wealthy. If the Latter-day Saints ever expect to become wealthy, it will be after they have established all the industries that are necessary to make them independent, and to provide for themselves every commodity of life that they need. I also saw in the Fair some specimens of blankets and other goods produced by the Deseret Woolen Mills, owned and managed by some of the late Brother William Jennings' family, and situated in the lower part of this city. I saw some goods as fine, I believe, as I have seen in any country—the result of the labor of our own people and the products of our own country. How much better this is than to have to buy all our blankets from abroad and to import everything that we wear that is needful for our comfort. Let me exhort my brethren and sisters who are assembled here today to remember these institutions that have been established among us. If you want blankets, where will you go to get them? I would advise you to get them from where those manufactured at home can be obtained. I would exhort you never to spend a dollar from this time forth, if you can avoid it, for anything that is produced abroad which is produced at home, even though you may be under the necessity of paying a little more for that produced here. I advise you to patronize home industry, because it helps to give employment to our home people, it helps to build up our own country, it helps to keep the wealth within our own community, and it builds us up better, faster, and more permanently than any other course can possibly do. Here is our sugar factory in Lehi. Some of our brethren are groaning under the weight of responsibility that rests upon them in connection with the establishment of that sugar factory. If I recollect right, President Willford Woodruff, President George Q. Cannon and your humble servant, and others of the Apostles, are today carrying tens of thousands of dollars in order that that industry might be established among the people, and in order that some of the sugar that is consumed by them might be produced at home by their own industry and skill, and that some of the money that we pay out annually for the sugar we consume might be kept at home and distributed to those who produce the article here. I want to remind my brethren and sisters throughout Zion that it is a portion of their duty to patronize these home industries and to sustain them by their patronage. For it is a good and wise policy. It is the policy that was inaugurated by President Young in the beginning of the settlement of this Territory. It is the policy that is today the wisest and the best for this community. We are still far separated from the centers of manufacture and in a comparatively new country; this should not be forgotten. It is not perhaps consistent with modern ideas to suppose for a moment that there could come a time of pinching, of poverty and of necessity in the tops of these mountains, connected as we are with the east and the west, with the north and the south, by these lines of railroads which run into and through our country. I know it is not orthodox now-a-days to consider or admit the possibility of a famine coming upon the inhabitants of North America. Do we not possess the richest country in the world? Are we not blessed with all the products of the temperate and the torrid zone? Are we not blessed with the greatest mineral, agricultural and stock-raising country in the world? Yes; and yet I read in the revelations which the Lord has given to us that a day of famine will come upon the land, a day of drouth, a day of necessity, a day of pestilence, and a day of deep sorrow. When that day shall come we will learn, if we do not learn it before, that the community which is the nearest self-supporting will be the most independent and the most prosperous that can be found anywhere in the land. There is another little factory in Franklin, Idaho. It is really a Utah industry, owned and carried on largely by Utah people, and they are producing some of the finest home-made blankets, linsey, flannel and yarn that can be produced anywhere in the country. I want to make honorable mention of it, as I have of the other mills. I am told also that Brother Whitehead, at Springville is manufacturing some goods. I desire to make mention of these things. What for? That I may induce you, my brethren and sisters, if I possibly can, to patronize these institutions, and to sustain by your works as well as by your prayers home industries, which give to the people employment, and put bread in their mouths and clothing upon their backs, and give them homes to shelter them, developing the resources of our country, and making it what it is today—the superior of any of its sister territories or states in this inter-mountain region. There is no state or territory in this inter-mountain region that can compare in material prosperity with the Territory of Utah, and it is largely due to the policy inaugurated by President Young, that it is still in vogue, or ought to be, among this people to foster home industry. A little while ago I gave an order for some home-made blankets. I can go to Z. C. M. I., or any of these stores which import foreign made goods and I can buy blankets for considerably less than I expect to have to pay for those that are made at home; but I would rather give a little more to our own workmen for the product of their labor than to purchase the imported article. But the fact of the matter is, I expect to get the worth of my money. Even if I do have to pay a little more for it, I believe the article will be that much better and more durable.

In times gone by we used to exhort the people to patronize our co-operative institutions. Here is Z. C. M. I. President Woodruff is the president of that institution. It is owned and managed by our people, principally. It is true that some of the stock has been placed on the market, and our outside friends, realizing that it was a good and safe institution, have invested in Z. C. M. I. stock. It is controlled in the interests of the people, not wholly for money-making, but to modify prices, and to regulate the markets of this region in relation to the articles which it deals in; to prevent combinations against the welfare of the people. Zion's Co-operative Mercantile Institution has been one of the best institutions for this community that has ever been established among them. President Young was the founder of it, and his idea was that the people should own it; that if there was any profit in merchandising, manufacturing, woolen goods, cotton goods, or any other kind of goods in the Territory of Utah, the people should receive the benefit of it; and therefore he established co-operative associations and invited the people to take stock in these institutions, that they might help to bear the responsibility and share in the benefits therefrom, and thereby all the people be blessed. President Young did not desire that one man alone or a few men should gather in all the "plums" in merchandising, but that all the people should share whatever profit there was in it. Will anyone deny that those who are interested in Z. C. M. I. have shared proportionately in the profits of that institution? I think they have. I have been in a small way interested in it from the beginning, and it has been one of the most profitable investments I ever made. It today pays the stockholders 12 per cent per annum on their stock, besides which it is laying away a residue as a reserve fund, to strengthen the institution, making it one of the most solid and reliable in the land. Shall we not patronize it? Shall we not sustain this industry? For it is an industry. We have a manufacturing department connected with it. We manufacture thousands of dollars' worth of boots and shoes; yet we are not able to manufacture anything like the amount that the community demands. Then we have an overall department, and we export overalls to Denver and to other places. We ought to be exporters rather than importers; and when we become exporters of the products of our labor, then indeed we will be in a condition approaching independence, and we shall not be independent till then. We do not all want to be farmers; and it would not be wise for us all to be sugar makers. It will not do for everybody to be merchants and bankers, because if we were, who would produce the sugar, the bread, the clothing, and the other necessities of life? We have a number of good cheese manufactories among us; but I do not know whether we have got far enough along to export cheese. Yet we ought to do it with the facilities we have here for raising lucern with and without irrigation. The Lord is opening the way for the people to raise lucern and grain, and even trees, on dry land without irrigation. I heard that Brother M. W. Merrill, one of the Twelve Apostles, who is here today, had said that if he were to be furnished with water free of cost to irrigate his land, that he would not accept of it to raise his grain with. (Brother Merrill here remarked that he had not watered his land for many years.) This is the finest lucern country that I know of; and we ought to raise good cows, and produce good milk, good butter and good cheese, sufficient to supply home consumption, and then we ought to have a little surplus to export. We ought to have more creameries, and we ought to buy home-made cheese, home-made butter, home-made sugar, home-made clothes, and all home-made articles, instead of patronizing those from abroad. If the people would do this, God would bless them, and they would become all the richer and the more prosperous; and those friends that are engaged in these manufactures would be encouraged, for their investments would not prove failures; and it would give more employment to the people, and create permanent wealth for the country.

I felt like saying something about home industries. But I want you to understand there is no politics in it. It is simply plainly-told Gospel truth. It is the Gospel of temporal salvation that I am preaching to this congregation, the Gospel of common sense. It is the Gospel of reason—a Gospel that the Latter-day Saints should all honor and observe, and not have to be urged to do it, either. We ought to have been converted to this years ago and have enjoyed the benefits that would have resulted to us from it, instead of today sending our money out of the country in a continuous stream for that which can be produced at home just as well as it can be produced abroad. This wealth ought to be kept at home, and employment given to our people, so that they will not be found wandering up and down the streets and through the country without anything to do. I am satisfied of this. It is good Gospel, too, in its place, just as much as faith in God, repentance of sin, and baptism for the remission of sin, are good Gospel precepts in their place. This temporal Gospel pertaining to our present welfare, in the building of temples, to the sending of the Gospel to the nations of the earth, to the gathering of the poor from distant lands, to publishing the word of God and distributing it abroad among the people, and to every material work involved in the progress and development of the community. You cannot do without it. The idler, with the Lord, shall not eat the bread of the laborer in Zion. The Lord requires that we shall not be idlers. Our people should not be without employment, when there is plenty of means and plenty of intelligence among them to devise industries and to give employment to those who are unemployed. We have got to do it, or we are not wise stewards or faithful servants.

I heard a prominent man, only this morning, make the remark that, notwithstanding the Latter-day Saints have received revelation from God with regard to the Word of Wisdom, and notwithstanding all the other conditions respecting this law, he believed that according to the number of the community there was more tea, coffee and tobacco imported into Utah than into any other of the territories surrounding us. The question was asked, "What proportion, do you think, of the Latter-day Saints actually keep the Word of Wisdom—that is, do not drink tea, or coffee, or strong drink, nor use tobacco in any form?" And it was expressed as his belief that there was not more than one-tenth of the people who absolutely kept the Word of Wisdom. If this is so, it is lamentable. I do not say that it is so. I hope it is not. I would rather believe that it was only one-tenth of the people that did not keep the commandments of God in this regard. Many of us are in the condition that Brother Liljenquist expressed himself as being in, at one time, myself included, though you would hardly think it perhaps. He said that somehow or other he seemed to crave everything that the Lord had said was not good for man.

I do not wish to parade my own weaknesses before you in order to tempt anyone. I only tell you that I have weaknesses as well as you. And if I can overcome my weaknesses, why cannot you overcome yours? If I, being fond of tobacco, can refuse to use it, why cannot you? If I, having a taste for liquor, do not use it, why cannot you do the same thing? And if I, being fond of tea and coffee, do not use them, why cannot you refrain from using them, too? That is the moral that I wish to impress upon your minds. That is the doctrine that I wish to teach you. I want to say to you that I, weak as I am, can refrain from these things, and therefore I believe that you can do the same if you will. I believe in the depths of my heart that if you will never take any more whiskey, or tea, or coffee, or tobacco, you will by and by have a good passport into the celestial city, if your other conduct is what it ought to be. I do not believe that I have ever indulged in these things to an extent that has grieved the Holy Spirit, or that has given offense to my Heavenly Father; that He cannot forgive; and in the future I intend to do better than I have done in the past—to be more faithful, if possible, and live a better life, and be more cautious in my conduct and example. And furthermore, I intend in the future to patronize home industries more faithfully than I have done in the past. I propose to buy home-made blankets, and not these shoddy things that are brought from abroad, paying the manufacturers of them in Lowell, or Boston, or some other manufacturing town in the East. I propose to sustain the woolen factories in Provo, in Salt Lake, in Beaver and other parts of this Territory. I propose to patronize them to the extent of my necessities and means. I hope that everyone present will do the same and that you will carry this spirit abroad with you, and that you will instill this doctrine into the hearts and minds of the people where you live, that the inhabitants of these mountain valleys may become patrons of home industry, and thereby build up themselves, their own towns, cities and villages, establish real wealth among themselves, and give employment to their own people. May God help us to do this, in my prayer, in the name of Jesus. Amen.

THE ANNEXATION VOTE.

Recorder Stanton sent in a communication in which he reported that the recent annexation election had been held in accordance with law; that there were sufficient votes in favor of the proposition and not enough to defeat it. He asked for instruction regarding the same.

Kelly—I have been informed on good authority that the proposition is going to be contested and it is stated that tenants of property principally had voted in favor of the scheme and not the property owners.

Wantland moved that the communication be spread upon the minutes, and that the recorder be instructed to furnish the secretary of the Territory with a certified copy of the election.

Loofbourow said there was only one thing the council could do in the matter, and that was to take such action as was embraced in Mr. Wantland's motion.

Wantland's motion was then carried.

CITY CREEK FLUME.

The watermaster reported that the work of fluming City Creek between Sixth and Ninth West had been completed, and recommended that the street be filled and graded on both sides of the flume and brought up to the proper grade, as that would make the street passable on both sides of the flume.

Referred to the committee on streets with power to act.

BIGHAM YOUNG PRIVATE CEMETERY.

The city attorney reporting on the assessment of the Brigham Young private cemetery said that if the tract of ground were really a burying ground it was non-assessable. Received and filed.

THAT TUSCARORA TRIP.

The committee on claims reported favorably on the bills of Policemen George A. Bright, Thomas Mathews and Walter Sherman for the fourteen days they were absent on the recent Tuscarora trip to Chicago.

In response to the question asked by Rich as to who gave the men permission to make their jaunt, Horn replied that the mayor had done so.

Hardy opposed the report stating that the recommendation was unjust. He was sustained in his argument by Kelly, Bardsley and Moran.

Foiland said that he was not in favor of the report therefore did not sign it. The policemen had their "day off" once or twice a month. They were entitled to such vacation but not in taking an extended trip.

Evans said he had been antagonistic to the proposition from the commencement. Rich moved to lay the matter on the table indefinitely. Lost.

Moran moved to refer to the mayor. Carried.

ON THE SIDE.

In the matter of the location of electric light poles the street committee reported as follows:

We believe that the electric light poles should be placed on the sides of the street rather than in the center, and we therefore recommend that the city engineer be authorized to locate the said poles accordingly.

Lawson—One week ago we decided, after a full and free discussion, to put these poles in the center of the street. Now the committee recommends that the poles be put on the side of the street. I suppose that next week they will reverse their present recommendation. I am getting sick and tired of such child's play. We should understand that these electric corporations have plenty of money and are not favorable to the city. The proper place for the wires is underground.

Foiland sprung the pole of order that there was nothing before the house, the communication read not being a report, inasmuch as it was signed by only two members, while the rules of the council declared that no such document was a report unless signed by three members.

The chair ruled that the report could be considered providing the Council as a body was willing.

Hardy said he was unalterably opposed to placing the poles on or near the sidewalks. The sidewalks were none too wide, in fact they were often so crowded in the central part of the city that pedestrians found it difficult to pass each other. Our streets were wide and it was expensive to keep them up. He favored narrowing them by increasing the sidewalks.

Rich made a similar argument and advocated the underground system which would have to be adopted before many years.

Wantland said he had jointly investigated the proposition with the city engineer and chief of the fire department, and they all decided that the proper place for the poles at present was on the side of the street.

Evans said he was also favorable to the report. He did not think that the poles would be an obstruction to sidewalk use or street traffic, neither would they be unsightly.

The report was then adopted.

SEWER PETITION.

The committee on sewerage reported favorably on the petition of George and Penny Price to lay a sewer pipe at their own expense. Adopted.

GRAVITY SEWER PROPOSITION.

City engineer sent in the following: To the Hon. City Council:

In pursuance of your instructions I have made a preliminary survey of the route for a gravity sewer which will intercept our present main sewer on Fifth South street at the intersection of First West street. From here I will extend northward and westward for a distance of six miles and terminate at a point about 1½ miles north of the Hot Springs where the sewerage can be discharged upon and used to irrigate the barren plain which lies between the railways and the river and extends from Hot Springs on the south to Great Salt Lake on the north. Embosomed within these boundaries are at least 5,000 acres of land which is now worthless for agricultural purposes because there is no available water with which to irrigate it. All this land can be reclaimed by applying the sewage from the city for irrigation.

The cost of a masonry sewer of sufficient size to dispose of the sewage from the city when its population shall have reached 200,000 will cost about $325,000 and will require about one year from the time of starting to complete the work.

The survey shows that the streets and railway lands can be followed for the greater portion of the entire distance and the annoyance and delay which usually attends the procurement of right of way from a great number of small land owners can in this case be avoided.

Appreciating the urgent need of a permanent and efficient means of disposing of our sewage and being opposed to any expensive additions to our present temporary plant, I take the liberty of adding to this report a most earnest recommendation that the work be undertaken without delay. And I suggest, if you have any doubts as to the practicability or superiority of the plan, that one or more of our local engineers or that an engineer of special experience in this branch of engineering be called in for consultation.

Reminding you that at least six months' time should be devoted to the preparation of plans and specifications before the work can be properly started, and calling attention to the fact that should the work be ordered at once, it will be next May before a beginning can be made, I am very respectfully, etc.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

On motion of Wantland the matter was referred to a special committee with power to act, consisting of the city engineer, the city attorney, Messrs. Wantland, Moran and Folland.

A WATER DEAL.

The city attorney submitted a contract between the city and Oscar Youngberg for the use of the water of certain springs in Parley's canyon. It seems that some five years ago Youngberg squatted on a piece of land on which were a number of springs, of which he took possession, and used the same for irrigation and culinary purposes. The city claimed a prior right to these springs and there has been a dispute ever since. The contract provides that in consideration for a settlement of all disputes as to the water right, the said Youngberg is to have a right to use enough water for culinary purposes and for irrigating his lawn; he is also given the right to use surplus water from Parley's creek for irrigating free of charge and the city is given the exclusive right to control the springs and to develop them and conduct the water through ditches or flumes across the land of the said Youngberg to the creek.

The report was adopted and the mayor authorized to execute the contract for the city.

The committee on sewers reported recommending the purchase of a pumping plant from Jones & Jacobs, for $11,850 for the entire plant set up in running order. These figures include the erection of a pumping station to cost about $800. The committee recommended that the mayor be authorized to make the purchase.

The city fathers met in special session last night to consider the sewage question. President Looftbourow being absent Councilman Simonds was called to the chair. The members in attendance were: Rich, Folland, Hardy, Karrick, Moran, Horne, Lawson, Kelly, Evans, Beardsley, Wantland, Heims—18.

Absent—Looftbourow, Bell—2.

After reading the minutes of the last meeting the Council took up the report of the committee on sewerage, recommending the purchase of a new pump for the sewer pump from Jones and Jacobs, for $118.50, which was laid on the table at the last meeting.

Hardy asked if it would be necessary to enlarge the output pipe over Jordan. Chairman Lawson answered in the negative.

Hardy said he was in favor of making the best sanitary provisions possible but if it was going to cost $20,000 or any sum approaching that to get rid of the sewage temporarily he would oppose the proposition. It was a well known fact that a permanent sewage farm would soon have to be procured. The Council should be careful.

Moran then asked for the reading of a paper from the mayor to the committee on sewerage.

Lawson—That paper must not be read here as the reporters will publish its contents and then the Evil One will rage. It must not be read.

Wantland—I, too, object to the reading of that report. The public should not know its contents. Some time ago a certain news paper raised a great stink while our city was full of tourists. The odor from the article I refer to was much worse than the sewage which flowed into the river. It did this city a good deal of injury. Capitalists wrote to me from the east saying for—sake keep such reports out of our newspapers or we will have to invest our money elsewhere.

Moran—I don't care whether the councilmen object or not. If the chair rules that it cannot be read I will read it myself. I want every man to understand that. The public should know what we are doing with the city's money.

Kelly—I have read that report and I do not think there is anything in it that should not be made public.

Moran—(rising angrily)—I tell you gentlemen that this document has got to be read. If the council declares against me I shall take the paper from the hands of the recorder and read it myself.

Horn—That paper has never been before this council until tonight, and I say that it should be referred to the committee on sewerage.

Moran—(Jumping to his feet)—I will and shall read this report.

Hardy—I move to refer it to the committee on sewerage.

Wantland—(promptly)—I second the motion, and in so doing I will again say, do not allow it to be read.

Lawson—I call the gentleman to order.

The chair—State your point of order.

Lawson—The paper is not properly before the house. Mr. Moran talks for delay; nothing else. I know his little game.

Rich—Mr. President—

Horn—I call the gentleman to order.

Rich—Mr. President—

Horn—(interrupting)—The gentleman is not in order.

Rich—I am not addressing you. I am speaking to the chair.

Horn—Well, you are out of order and cannot speak.

Rich—Who and what are you?

Whack! whack! went the chairman's gavel and then came the words, "Gentlemen, you must not go on in this manner. You should be respectful to each other and rule 11 says that no member shall speak more than once on any subject except by unanimous consent.

Moran—I am going to read this paper.

Lawson (growing white and trembling with rage)—Mr. Moran, you are out of order.

Moran—Never you mind; that is my own affair.

Lawson—Mr. President, I want a ruling.

Drum came the president's gavel again with a force that startled every councilman from his seat.

The chair was disgusted, puzzled, powerless and pandemonium reigned for several seconds. It looked for a time as though there was going to be a personal conflict between Lawson, Moran and the chair. When the trio had partially recovered their tempers a calm discussion was commenced, but almost instantly Moran grabbed the document from the recorder's table and proceeded to read it.

Wantland interrupted by saying that the paper was a private one and Moran added, "Yes, it's private. It is mine and I am going to read it. See? Just listen to what I now say in connection with the reading of it."

Moran held the floor and Lawson said, "Well, if this man is going to cram that paper down our throats in a lump I guess we will have to swallow it."

The vital part of the paper was that portion of it which said that 850 gallons of sewage per minute ran in to the river for eighteen hours a day and that for the remaining six hours out of every twenty-four all of it was allowed to run into the river.

Folland said he was in favor of increasing the pumping plant of the city; but he objected to the bid presented for the reason that not one of them complied with the specifications. It seemed to him that the interests of the city had been loosely looked after. The bids, no doubt, suited the bidders all right, but as far as the city was concerned nothing was absolutely guaranteed. The new plant would entail an additional expense of about $30,000 for piping and on the whole he thought it would cost more than it would come to. He informed the Council that to deliver 2,500,000 gallons of water through 12-inch pipes 11,000 feet long would require 60-horse power to overcome the friction along. To run a 60-horse power engine would require at least two tons of coal every twenty-four hours. If a proper sized pipe would be used the actual power required to force that amount of water through it would not be over 20-horse power. At the present time in all properly conducted transaction a rigid guarantee would be required of the amount of water to be delivered to each ton of coal used and provisions were always made to ascertain the amount by actual test of the machinery. The usual requirement was from 75,000,000 to 90,000,000 foot pounds of water to each 1000 pounds of coal used. In all of these important matters, the committee has failed to protect the city, consequently he would vote against the report.

The city engineer was called upon to speak on the subject. He said that it the present time there was a much greater flow of sewage than there ought to be. This was either from the illegitimate use of water or else there was a leak in the sewer some place that let the water in. This might be worth investigation. He was in favor of the pump as a temporary arrangement, but he only way to settle the sewerage question was to put in the gravity system just as soon as possible. In the meantime, the excessive flow of water in the sewer ought to be investigated. It was out of all proportion with the number of people served by the sewer. One reason for it was probably defective plumbing. In almost every office building in the city every tap could be found running a small stream all the time. This was not a use of water; it was an abuse of water. If this was investigated and the present pump set lower, they might get along with it for the present. Even if they bought the new pump they would have to run the sewage into the canal, and that would be objectionable, too. The flow of sewage in our present sewers ought not to be more than 600,000 gallons per twenty-four hours.

Moran.—Mr. Doremus, how much water per capita per day do we use in our sewer district?

Mr. Doremus.—About one hundred gallons. In European cities an average of only thirty-three gallons per capita is consumed. In New York, where a great amount of water per capita is used than in any other city, the rate is a little more than one hundred gallons per day.

Rich.—I am in favor of purchasing the pump, and I think other members of the Council also favor the proposition, but the bids are incomplete and indefinite. That is what we object to.

Moran again arose and proceeded to speak and the chair said he was ubiquitous and too talkative and he ruled him out of order.

Lawson then attempted to speak on the question and was very persistent until the chair was emphatic and tapped the table hard and long with his gavel and said Mr. Lawson could not and should not speak again.

Lawson—I have not spoken on this before.

The Chair.—Yes you have.

Lawson then sat down muttering: "I tell you Mr. Chairman that you are wrong and I want you to remember it." The motion to accept the bid for the purchase of the pump then carried.

AFTER HOLD OVER OFFICIALS.

Heise offered the following:

Whereas, It is claimed that there are now appointed officers discharging the duties of certain officers and holding over after the time has expired for which they were appointed; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the committee on elections is hereby instructed to investigate the matter and report to this council at the next meeting all such cases, if any such exist, the name of the office and the party or parties so holding over.

Folland.—I am in favor of this resolution. I think it should go to the committee for investigation and report. If there are individuals holding over we should know who they are.

Rich.—I concur with Mr. Folland. If we have officials holding over in violation of law we should know it.

The report went to the committee on elections.

THE GRAVITY SEWER QUESTION.

The report of the city engineer on the gravity sewer question, published in full in the News on Thursday last, came up and was discussed in a decidedly amateurish manner for nearly an hour and then went over until the next regular meeting without any definite action having been taken.

ICE POND NUISANCE ABOLISHED.

Mr. Evans offered the following:

Resolved, That the parties owning or leasing the ice pond situated on Ninth West street, between South Temple and North Temple streets (known as Hunter's pond), be so permitted to take water from the Ninth West street canal or City creek for the purpose of making ice, and the watermaster is hereby authorized to prevent the damming of City creek at Ninth West street for that purpose.

MISCELLANEOUS.

White & Sons and others asked for an electric light at the junction of Richardson's street and First South street.

A. F. Kendall and others asked for an electric light at the intersection of U. and Second streets.

H. R. A. Grives and others asked for an electric light at the intersection of H. and Fifth streets.

E. P. Deal and H. Shields asked for a lease on a piece of city property north of Fort Douglas for a rock quarry. Referred to the committee on public grounds.

The Recorder reported that sewer intention No. 5 for a sewer along First South street, from Fifth to Eighth East street, had been published as by law required, and not enough protests to defeat it had been received. The council ordered the intention of the council to make the improvement advertised, and November 17th was fixed as the date for the sitting of the board of equalization on the assessment.

A DREAM OF WEALTH.

A special correspondent of the San Francisco Chronicle writing from Phoenix, Arizona, under date November 4th, says: One of the most peculiar freaks of psychological phenomena ever brought to light has just culminated in this county, and it will not only be of interest to the scientists who study the relations of the mind but to the curious as well. In 1859 two brothers, A. B. and Luther Ellett, lived in Nemaha county, Kas. Luther chose the part of the wanderer and came west, presumably, to Colorado, and nothing more was heard of him except vague reports that he had been killed by Indians. Then the war came and A. B. Ellett served four years in the Union army, coming out in 1865 completely broken in health. He returned to Kansas and settled down on his farm, near Sabetha, where he remained until recently. He accepted rumors as truth, and not getting any letters from his brother, regarded him as dead. In 1889 he was afflicted by the breaking out of an old wound and was confined to his room for many weeks. During that time he dreamed that his brother was alive and in Prescott, A. T. It seemed that they were together in the mountains, and in passing down a canyon they discovered a fabulously rich gold mine a few miles from an old abandoned shaft once owned by Luther. The dream made little impression on him, but the next night it was repeated and even the trees and outlines of the mountains were perfectly impressed on his mind. He did not heed the possibility of the mine being mere, for the smell of hay had never been out of his nostrils, and he did not know quartz from lava but he thought it worth while to make some inquiry about his brother, which he did.

A letter directed to the postmaster at Prescott brought the information that his brother was an old resident, but was then out in the mines. A correspondence began between the two brothers, and during its course the part of the dream relating to the mine was divulged. Being in that vicinity one day Luther Ellett looked for the mine, but found nothing. The matter passed along until a month ago, when the Kansas brother concluded to visit his relative in Arizona, and at the same time to look at the country. He still had an inclination to look for the mine, but was ashamed to own it. His brother met him in Prescott, and after staying a few days there they came to the mountains and visited the old abandoned mine. When they approached it the Kansas man recognized the country as the one he had seen in his dreams, and told even how the shaft was situated with regard to the mountains and canyons with such accuracy that his brother was filled with astonishment, but he was an old prospector and a belief in dreams was not one of his superstitions. When they arrived at the spot Mr. Ellett said it seemed to him that he had often been there before, and after looking over the ground they took a pick and walked westward toward the point indicated by the dream. In crossing the canyon the prospector stumbled on a very rich ledge and exultantly exclaimed that they had found the mine. The brother answered that it might be rich, but the one they were in search of was richer. Climbing up the other side of the gulch they came to the spot where the dreams had located the lode, but there was nothing in sight but half-decomposed granite. The perfect resemblance of the land marks had so excited their hope that they were much disappointed, and they stood for some time talking the matter over. While so standing the one with the pick began picking on the shelving rock, and a great piece of it fell down, exposing a blind ledge of white quartz resplendent with free gold. They worked into the mass, finding it to be about thirty inches in width and widening as it went down at an angle of forty-five degrees. The prospector is still there, afraid to leave the mine for fear of claim-jumpers, but his brother brought a sack of the samples to Phoenix and the assays go $2800 in $19 to the ounce gold. Samples have also been sent to the mint in San Francisco for testing. When Mr. Ellett was seen by the Chronicle reporter he did not seem disposed to talk about the mine, saying that they wished to keep its existence quiet, and had done so for two weeks, but finding that mining men from that section had already told it he narrated the story as given above. Mr. Ellett is a responsible farmer in his home state, and before September had never seen an ounce of gold ore, so he counts himself as one of the creatures on whom Fortune has smiled. The story of the dream was published in 1889 by the Globe Democrat and several scientific journals in the East as illustrating the fact that former knowledge and information had nothing to do with the substance of dreams.

DEATH OF JAMES CALDWELL.

This morning the remains of Isaac James Caldwell, who died at his residence, 59 Center street, on Tuesday afternoon last, were forwarded to Tooele, his old home, for interment. The deceased was born in Eastern Canada, April 29th, 1833. He came to Utah in 1853 and located at Taylorville where he lived three years. He then moved to Rush Valley, Tooele County, where he married Miss Eliza Russell with whom he raised a large and respected family. In 1886 he removed to Tooele where he resided until a few months ago when he brought his family to this city where better facilities for educating his children were afforded. He was well and widely known throughout Utah. He served one term as selectman in Tooele county and two terms as a member of the municipal council of Tooele city and held the last named office at the time of his demise.

He was ever known as a fearless and outspoken citizen and a courageous and honest official in whom his constituents had the most implicit trust. He was affable, kind and generous to a fault. In his youthful days he took part in many of the hardships incidental to pioneer life in Utah. He was one of the seven presidents of the Forty-third quorum of Seventies. His death was due to a chronic kidney complaint of twenty-three years standing, and though naturally he was a man of splendid physique and constitution his sufferings were intense and all attempts to give him permanent relief failed. He leaves a wife and six children and a great many warm-hearted friends to mourn his death.

The mayor and members of the Tooele city council and a large number of prominent citizens of that place met the body at the depot and accompanied it to the deceased's home, a distance of about three miles.

Funeral services were held in the Tooele meeting house this afternoon at 2 o'clock. The speakers were President H. B. Gowans and Elders Alonzo J.

Stokey and John Gillespie. They referred to the leading characteristics of the deceased and advised his children to emulate his many virtues. Their words were full of consolation and encouragement to the bereaved. The interment took place at 4 o'clock.

EMERY STAKE CONFERENCE.

HUNTINGTON, Emery Co., Utah, Nov. 9, 1892.—The quarterly conference of the Emery Stake was held in Orangeville, Nov. 6th and 7th, President C. G. Larsen presiding. Present on the stand were the Stake presidency, Bishops, the president of the High Priests' quorum, and the leading members of the Priesthood throughout the Stake.

Six meetings in all were held and a good spirit prevailed. President Larsen was the first speaker. He reported the Stake to be in a fairly prosperous condition, yet there is much room for improvement. Advised the Bishops not to take all the responsibilities of the wards upon themselves, but to counsel with their brethren and ask for the support of the Stake, which should be freely given. Vacant offices should be promptly filled, and the ward organizations kept in perfect running order.

Strong testimonies were borne, and timely advice was given by Wm. Taylorson, Teancum Pratt, Alex. Jameson, Jno. D. Chase, Presidents Howard and Seeley and others. The furnishing of the Salt Lake Temple was the leading topic, and the people expressed great willingness to furnish the apportionment of means required of the Emery Stake. In reporting the condition of the various wards, the Bishops referred with regret to the coldness and lack of faith manifested by some of the members, although as a whole the reports were very satisfactory.

The statistical report showed 1,221 children under eight years of age, out of 8,593 total of souls.

A Sunday School union was held Sunday evening, at which Superintendent of Emery Stake Sunday Schools Uriah Curtis, and others, marked out a systematic plan which the schools should be conducted.

Much praise is due the Orangeville choir under their efficient leader, A. G. Jewkes, for the appropriate singing rendered at all the meetings.

The health of the people is good, and the crops, except potatoes, are over the average.

A. E. WALL,
Stake Clerk.

THE BOARD OF EDUCATION.

The Board of Education met in regular session last night, Vice President Nelson in the chair. The members in attendance were: Young, Alf, Newman, Raybould, Baldwin, Dooly and Pike.

OFFER ACCEPTED.

Geo. B. Emery, agent, notified the board of the acceptance of their offer of $60 a month for two rooms for school purposes on Fifth West street, between North Temple and First North streets. Adopted.

CEMENT INSTEAD OF WOOD.

Croxford Bros. & Bryant, contractors for the First ward school building, offered to put in cement instead of wood wainscoting at an extra cost of $365. Committee on sites and buildings.

WHAT THEY WANT.

The committee on sites and buildings reported recommending:

That the clerk be instructed to petition the City Council to grade First North street, between Sixth and Seventh West streets, in front of the Jackson school.

That the City Council be also petitioned to grade First South street, between Seventh and Eighth East streets, in front of the Bryant school.

That the City Council be also petitioned to establish a sidewalk grade on Fifth South street, between Third and Fourth West streets, in front of the Lincoln school.

That the attic of the Lowell school building be floored over with surfaced, square-edged lumber, and that the bid of the Salt Lake Building & Manufacturing company of $296 be accepted for the furnishing of the lumber and laying of the same. Adopted.

THE NEW DISTRICT.

The committee on school work recommended that the committee on sites and building be ordered to look up and report to the board the school requirements of the district lately annexed to the city. Adopted.

OLD FOR NEW.

The same committee requested that the principals of the different schools be asked to ascertain the number of old books which could be raised for the purpose of exchanging them for the new ones. Adopted.

NO NIGHT SCHOOL.

The same committee recommended that no night school be established this winter, the additional expenses to which the board has been put in running the day schools making it undesirable and unwise for it to undertake running night schools. Adopted.

GEOGRAPHICAL TEXT BOOKS.

This committee also reported that the lot of 1000 of Byron's school geographies received were unsatisfactory as regards the Utah supplement to the book and that the book was almost useless on that account.

Young moved that the books be not accepted and that the publishers be communicated with, with the view of ascertaining how much reduction they would make on the lot in case the board accepted them, as it was thought at some future time the books might be used. Adopted.

Pike moved that the Hendy & Meyers Engineering company be instructed to recommence the work of putting in the heating and ventilating system in the Lincoln and Bryant school buildings, and that in case of the failure of the company to complete the work in the time specified by the contract the board would strictly enforce the penalty incurred by the delay. Adopted.

RETURNED ELDERS.

Elder William Salter of South Bountiful returned from a mission to England, on October 30th. He left for his field of labor on August 29, 1891, and was on his arrival in Liverpool appointed to travel the In London Conference. He was released on account of ill health, but otherwise he enjoyed his mission very much.

Elder George Langlois of Huntsville, Weber county, called at the News office this morning, having returned from a mission to Great Britain. He left on the 5th of September, 1889, was appointed to the Nottingham conference, where he labored till March 4th, this year; he then spent a couple of months in Guernsey. On the 11th of August he went to London where he labored until released. Elder Langlois says he has enjoyed his mission very much, although he found people as a general rule very much prejudiced against the Gospel as taught by the Saints. He arrived in Ogden on the 30th of October.

Elder Albert F. Haycock, of Panguitch, arrived in this city yesterday, having concluded a mission to England. He left home for the mission field exactly two years from the date of his return to Utah. He labored for the first eighteen months in the Leeds conference, and the latter part of the time was spent in the Birmingham conference. Elder Haycock met with some little opposition, but this in no way, he says, discourages the missionaries, who try in every way to bring the Gospel before the people among whom they seek to labor.

Brother Haycock started for Panguitch this morning. He is in the enjoyment of good health, and has had a pleasant and profitable mission abroad.

CROOKED JOE.

[St. Louis Republic.]

A great railroad depot may not be the best school for a boy, yet poor little Joe Bryan had scarcely known any other. He could not remember when the long waiting room, with its tiled floors and dreary rows of stationary settees, and crowds of hurrying people, were not quite as familiar to him and more homelike than his mother's small, bare house, which he knew as little more than a place for eating and sleeping.

At an age when an ordinary babe might have been frightened into convulsions by the shriek of a locomotive, Joe, securely fastened in his cab, would stare for hours through the great window, undisturbed by the incessant rush and roar of arriving and departing trains.

He had only been six months old when the dreadful accident happened which, at one fell stroke, made him fatherless and transformed him from a strong, well-developed infant to a pitiful creature, which even death refused to take.

The old yardmen tell the story even yet—how young Michael Bryan, as straight and manly a fellow as ever left his green, old, native island for the better chances of the new world this side of the sea, came whistling out of the roundhouse that morning and stepped hastily from an incoming locomotive, neither seeing nor hearing another rushing up the parallel track. His mates cried out to him—too late! Nobody who saw it would ever forget the look of agony which distorted his handsome face in that horrible instant when he recognized his doom, or the perpendicular leap into the air, from which he fell back beneath the crunching wheels.

In the excitement and consternation of the time no messenger had been sent in advance to prepare the poor young wife for her trouble, and she stood in the doorway with her baby crowing in her arms, when the stout bearers roused at her gate with their mangled burden. She uttered a terrible cry and fell fainting—the child's tender back striking the sharp edge of the door stone.

"What pity that it was not killed outright!" said everybody but the mother. She herself always insisted that only her constant watching over the little flickering life kept her from going mad in the first dreadful months of her bereavement.

The officers of the railway company were kind to poor Mary Bryan. They paid the expenses of the burial, and after little Joe had slowly mended, employed her about the depot to scrub the floors and keep the glass and wood-work bright and neat.

When Joe was seven years old his mother sent him to school. He went patiently, day after day, making no complaint, but she awoke suddenly one night to find him sobbing on the pillow beside her. Only by the dint of long coaxing was she able to find out the cause of his grief. Some of the rougher boys—more thoughtless than cruel, let us hope—had called him Humpy, and asked if he carried a bag of meal on his back.

Mary flamed with the fierce anger of motherhood.

"You shan't go another day!" she declared. "The ruffians! I won't have my darlin' put upon by the likes of them!"

So Joe's schooling had come to an untimely end. Yet, meager as was his stock of book learning, the development of his mind far outstripped the growth of his stunted and deformed body. Everybody liked the patient little fellow, tugging manfully at his mother's heavy water buckets, and running willingly at every call of the station men. At twelve years old he had picked up no small amount of information, especially on railroad topics. He knew every locomotive on the road, understood the intricacies of side tracks and switches, and could tell the precise moment when any particular train might be expected with the accuracy of a time table.

Yet the very quickness and ardor of his nature deepened the sense of his infirmity. The glances cast upon him by stranger eyes, some pitiful, some curious, others, alas! expressive only of annoyance or disgust, rankled like so many arrows in his heart; not one missed its mark. How wistfully his eyes followed boys of his own age—straight, handsome, happy—who sprang lightly up and down the steps of the coaches, or threaded their way along the crowded platforms. For one day of such perfect, untrammelled life he would have bartered all the possible years before him. Yet he never put his yearning into words, even to his mother.

"Crooked Joe's a rum 'un," said one of his rough acquaintances. "He senses his trouble well enough, but he don't let on to nobody."

Mr. Crump, the telegraph operator, was Joe's constant friend. It was he who, at odd moments, had taught the boy to read, and had initiated him into some of the mysteries of the ticking instrument, which to Joe's imaginative mind seemed some strange creature with a hidden life of its own.

It was growing dark one November afternoon. Joe—never an unwelcome visitor—sat curled in a corner of Mr. Crump's office, waiting for his mother to finish her work. He was laboriously spelling out, by the fading light, the words upon a page of an illustrated newspaper, quite oblivious of the ticking, like that of a jerky and rheumatic clock, which sounded in the room.

Mr. Crump, too, had a paper before him, but his ears were alive. Suddenly he sprang to his feet, repeating aloud the message which that moment flashed along the wire.

"Engine No. 110 running wild. Clear track."

He rushed to the door shouting the news.

"Not a second to spare! She'll be down in seven minutes."

The words passed like lightning. In a moment the yard was in a wild commotion. Men flew hither and thither, yard engines steamed wildly away, the switches closing behind them.

The main track was barely clear when 110 came in sight, swaying from side to side, her wheels threatening to leave the track at each revolution. She passed the depot like a meteor, her bell clanging with every leap of her piston, the steam escaping from her whistle with the continuous shriek of a demon, and the occupants of the cab wrapped from view in a cloud of smoke.

Some hundred rods beyond the depot the track took a sharp, upward grade, from which it descended again to strike the bridge across a narrow but deep and rocky gorge.

Men looked after the flying locomotive and then at each with blanched faces.

"They're gone! A miracle can't save 'em," said one, voicing the wordless terror of the rest. "If they don't fly the track on the up-grade they'll go down as soon as they strike the trestle."

The crowd began to run along the track, some with a vain instinct of helplessness, some moved by that morbid curiosity which seeks to be "in at the death."

But look! Midway the long rise in the speed of the runaway engine suddenly slackens.

"What does it mean? She never could 'a' died out in that time!" shouted an old yardman.

Excitement winged their feet. When the foremost runner reached the place the smoking engine stood still on her track, quivering in every steel-clag nerve, her great wheels still whirling round and round amid a flight of red sparks from beneath.

"What did it? Who stopped her?"

The engineer, staggering from the cab with the pallid face of the fireman behind him, pointed, without speaking, to where a little pale-faced, crooked-backed boy had sunk down, panting with exertion, beside the track.

At his feet a huge oil can lay overturned and empty.

The crowd stared one at another, open mouthed. Then the truth flashed upon them.

"He oiled the track!"

"Bully for Crooked Joe!"

They caught the exhausted child, flinging him from shoulder to shoulder, striving with each other for the honor of bearing him back to the depot and set him down among them.

"Pass the hat, pards!" cried one.

It had been payday, and the saved engineer and fireman dropped in each their month's wages. Not a hand in all the throng that did not delve into pocket. There was the crisp rustle of bills, the clink of gold and silver coin.

"Out with your handkerchief, Joe! Your hands won't hold it all! Why, young one, what's the matter?" for the boy, with scarlet cheeks and burning eyes, had clenched both small hands behind his back—the poor twisted back laden with its burden of deformity and pain.

"No! no!" he cried, in a shrill, high voice. "Don't pay me! Can't you see what it's worth to me, once—just once in my life—to be a little use—like other folks?"

The superintendent had come from his office. He laid his hand on the boy's head.

"Joe," he said, "we couldn't pay you if we wished. Money doesn't pay for lives! But you have saved us a great many dollars besides. Won't you let us do something for you?"

"You can't! You can't! Nobody can!" The child's voice was almost a shriek. It seemed to rend the air with the pent-up agony of years. "There's only one thing in the world I want, and nobody can give me that. Nobody can ever make me anything but Crooked Joe!"

The superintendent lifted him and held him against his own breast.

"My boy," he said, in his firm, gentle tones, "you are right. None of us can do that for you. But you can do it yourself. Listen to me! Where is the quick brain God gave you and the brave heart? Not in that bent back of yours—that has nothing to do with them! Let us help you to a chance—only a chance to work and to learn—and it will rest with you, yourself, to say whether in twenty years from now, if you are alive, if you are Crooked Joe or Mr. Joseph Bryan!"

"Visiting in C— not long ago, a friend said to me:

"Court is in session. You must go with me and hear Bryan."

The court-room was already crowded at our entrance with an expectant audience. When the brilliant young attorney rose to make his plea I noticed with a shock of surprise that his noble head surmounted an under-sized and misshapen body. He had spoken but five minutes, however, when I had utterly forgotten the physical defect; in ten I was eagerly interested, and thereafter, during the two hours' speech, held spell-bound by the marvellous eloquence which is fast raising him to the leadership of his profession in his native city.

"A wonderful man!" said my friend, as we walked slowly homeward. Then he told me the story of Crooked Joe.

DESIRABLE AS IMMIGRANTS.

[North American Review.]

There is no nation in Europe that is more adverse to violence, and has less sympathy with Utopian aspirations than the people of Norway and Sweden. They have been trained to industry, frugality and manly self-reliance by the free institutions and the scant resources of their native lands; and the moderation and self-restraint inherited the in cool blood of the Northmake them constitutionally inclined to trust in slow and orderly methods rather than swift and violent ones. They come here with no millennial expectations, doomed to bitter disappointment; but with the hope of gaining, by hard and unrelenting toil, a modest competency. They demand less of life than continental immigrants of the corresponding class, and they usually, for this very reason, attain more. The instinct to save is strong in the majority of them and save they do, when their neighbors, of less frugal habits, are running behind.

It is therefore a fact which all students of the social problem arising from immigration have remarked, that the Scandinavians adapt themselves with great ease to American institutions. There is no other class of immigrants which is so readily assimilated, and assumes so naturally American customs and modes of thought. And this is not because their own nationality is devoid of strong characteristics, but because, on account of their ancient kinship and subsequent development, they have certain fundamental traits in common with us, and are therefore less in need of adaptation. The institutions of Norway are the most democratic in Europe, and those of Sweden, though less liberal, are developing in the same direction. Both Norsemen and Swedes are accustomed to participate in the management of their communal affairs, and to vote for their representative in the national parliament; and although the power given them here is nominally greater than that they enjoyed at home, it is virtually less. The sense of public responsibility, the habit of interest in public affairs, and a critical attitude towards the acts of government are nowhere so general among the rich and poor alike as in Norway and Sweden, notwithstanding the fact that the suffrage is not universal.

The Pope Mining company, of Phillipsburg, Montana, which has been in litigation for a long time over the Porter Extension, Price, Imperial and Garnet, has compromised by payment of $22,000, and will now push ahead without let or hindrance.

Among the valuable mining properties of Arizona, the Phoenix mine, situated thirty five miles northeast of this city, is perhaps the greatest, says the Phoenix Republican. The character of the ore is free-milling gold, and from present indications, as well as from experience, the quantity of ore is unlimited.

The number of elk taken through this city a few days ago by Col. W. H. Root was twenty. This is the statement of the Laramie, Wyo., Boomerang. He was taking them to John H. Starin, the New York millionaire, and they will be turned loose in his park at Fultonville, New York. Mr. Root secured these animals at Beaver canyon, Idaho, to which point they were brought in from the back country. These animals are caught out there during the winter when the snow gets deep. Hunters then set out and chase them down in the snow with dogs. Some moose have been caught out there in the same way, and Mr. Root said when he passed through the city that he knew where he could get sixty buffalo. Fourteen of the carload taken through were males and six females. He expects to send several more carloads of the animals east.

DISCOURSE

By Apostle Franklin D. Richards, Friday, October 7, 1892, at the General Conference, held in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Utah.

[REPORTED BY ARTHUR WINTER.]

Beloved hearers, having an opportunity to occupy a few minutes this afternoon, I desire, before entering upon any remarks myself, to read a very short revelation that is contained in the sixty-fifth section of the book of Doctrine and Covenants, entitled "Revelation on Prayer, given through Joseph, the Seer, at Hiram, Portage county, Ohio, in the fore part of October, 1831."

Hearken, and lo, a voice as of one from on high, who is mighty and powerful, whose going forth is unto the ends of the earth, yea, whose voice is unto men—Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make His paths straight.

The keys of the Kingdom of God are committed unto man on the earth, and from thence shall the Gospel roll forth unto the ends of the earth, as the stone which is cut out of the mountain without hands shall roll forth until it has filled the whole earth.

Yea, a voice crying, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, prepare ye the supper of the Lamb, make ready for the Bridegroom.

Pray unto the Lord, call upon His holy name, make known His wonderful works among the people;

Call upon the Lord, that His Kingdom may go forth upon the earth, that the inhabitants thereof may receive it, and be prepared for the days to come, in the which the Son of man shall come down in heaven, clothed in the brightness of His glory, to meet the Kingdom of God which is set up on the earth.

Wherefore may the Kingdom of God go forth, that the Kingdom of heaven may come, that Thou, O God, mayest be glorified in heaven so on earth, that Thy enemies may be subdued; for Thine is the honor, power and glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

I felt inclined to read this revelation, as it seems to be the most direct one given to the Latter-day Saints upon the subject of prayer. Before the days of the Savior, John the Baptist taught his disciples how to pray, and when the Savior had come, the brethren seemed to think that He, being greater than John the Baptist, and the work being advanced by His coming, could teach them better than he, and they wanted to know of Him how to pray. He taught them, as Latter-day Saints do all know; and this seems to be the direction and object of the prayer, that we should ask God and importune with Him that His kingdom may come and His will be done as in heaven so upon the earth, that it may be prepared for the kingdom of heaven to come, when the Son of Man shall descend from heaven, clothed in the brightness of His glory.

From this revelation just read, it appears that the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ is the great point at which all our prayers should be directed. It seems to be the great leading object of our work here upon the earth, to be endeavoring continually to spread abroad the kingdom of God here on the earth. It is the point, starting from whatever radius we will, that all the lines of our operations should be centered in—the one great and glorious event, when He shall come and take to Himself His ruling power, and rule and reign on the earth, King of nations, as He reigns already King of Saints. It would appear, from the spirit of this prayer and from the phraseology of it, that its tenacity and its concentration of purpose would all point to that great event which is to be brought to pass—the second coming of the Lord Jesus Christ upon the earth. It is what the military man would say, the point d'appui—the point of all our operations and all our evolutions of life, as the armies of Israel and as the strength of the house of God, to be working in that direction. The Lord told the Elders in many of the early revelations, Ye know not the work that you are doing. Ye are called upon to lay the foundation of a great and a mighty work in the earth. The Prophet Joseph and all the early Elders, in the days of their liberty and freedom, when the light of revelation shone upon them continually, talked of and dwelt much upon the enlargement of the kingdom of God, the extension of the powers of His Priesthood and of His work, to prepare the people upon the earth that they should be ready for His coming and for the coming of those holy ones whom He will bring with Him, named in this revelation as the kingdom of heaven.

I bear testimony to you, my brethren and sisters, this afternoon, that no less than this is the work in which we are now engaged. All the vicissitudes of the latter-day work, however pleasant or unpleasant they may seem to us, are couched in, contemplated by, and constitute a part of this great movement, which is to bring to pass the great event here spoken of. The work which is upon us in these latter days, as it appears to my mind, is the greatest dispensation that has been given to man, or that any of the Prophets have considered, unless we should except the grand, the deep and potential remark of the Savior when He spoke to the disobedient Jews and told them that upon them should come all the righteous blood that had been shed from the days of Abel down to the days of Zachariah, who was slain in their day between the porch and the altar. In that potential saying was couched a responsibility devolving upon that generation which the human mind, without the revelations of the Holy Ghost, cannot comprehend.

To us in the dispensation of the fullness of times it is given to labor for the gathering together of all things which are in Christ Jesus, not only which are on the earth, but which are in the heavens also—a work which the Prophet Joseph, while with us, labored continually to unfold to our view, by setting forth in some of his last sermons the great responsibility that rests upon the people to hunt out and administer for their dead for the gathering together of all things which are in Christ, which are in heaven and which are upon the earth! What a saying! Who can contemplate the extent, the height, the depth and the breadth of the signification of that expression? Yet who is there of us, among all the vast assemblies of God's people, who is not directly interested, absolutely affected personally in that work and in its mighty results and consequences? And how often are we, by the trivial circumstances of life, allowing ourselves to be diverted from these great and momentous considerations into many things which are exceedingly unworthy of us as Latter-day Saints? Yet the Lord has cared for us, and is caring for us continually. His work, as we see from these unbounded expressions, is a work which is so far beyond our comprehension that it is worthy indeed the character of a God. He has been working with us ever since we first came to learn of the truth.

How singular it was that you and I got the spirit of gathering in the way that we did! When we came to hear the Gospel we became as strangers right in the lands in which we were born. That has been the condition of all faithful Saints in all periods of the earth of which we have any account. It was so with father Abraham. The Bible tells us but very little about him. Other histories inform us that so severe was his persecution, while yet an infant, that his mother had to take him and hide away in a cave of the earth; and his parents were so anxious concerning him that they carried food and sustained him and his mother for a long time. The sorcerers and the astrologers were stirred up to anxiety and curiosity, because there had another star appeared in the heavens at the birth of that boy Abraham. They thought it meant something, that it was significant, and it was whispered to the king, who tried to get the boy out of the way. Abraham's father, Terah, brought forth a child, by the king's command, from one of his other women, that was born just about the same time, and the king caused it to be destroyed. After awhile the mother of Abraham, thinking the anger of the king was appeased, ventured out with the boy.

Another history tells us that he was placed to dwell awhile with Shem, the good old patriarch, and lived several years with him, hid up and secluded, studying the things of God. He loved righteousness, and, hungering for more righteousness, got away from the idolatry of his relations, and even of his father's house, and was for some time studying the things of God in the houses of those early patriarchs that had just come through the flood. When he ventured to come out again, and it was found out that he was that same Abraham, the wrath of the king was aroused with double fury, and this time he was seized upon and put into a fiery furnace. The Bible does not tell us of this, but other histories do. The Mohammedan's bible tells him of it. It is in the Koran. Abraham was so dealt with by this persecution that he wondered where he could find a place on the earth, wherein he could dwell in safety. The Lord told him to get him up out of that country, and He would show him a place, a little way off, that he should have for his own sometime.

This is just the feeling and spirit that took hold of many of us Latter-day Saints in the various nations where we heard this Gospel. We became all at once strangers. Our relations and best friends became our enemies, many of us were turned out and found a gathering place with the Saints, as it is written, "Gather my Saints together who have made a covenant with me by sacrifice." This faith in the Gospel comes as a matter of sacrifice to the worldly. When we began to gather together and became a few in number, behold the wrath of the ungodly was such that it pervaded the township, or the settlement, or the Church abroad where we were, and scattered it, like the terrible wind, that blew the mustard stalk, scattered the seed abroad. Thus numerous converts were gathered into the Church, and the sacrifice brought in a harvest of souls, as the farmer sacrifices his seed to sow it upon the land, that it may bring forth the bread in the season thereof. Thus the work of the Lord has been the gathering of His Saints who covenanted with Him by sacrifice.

It was so when we were driven out from Missouri and from Illinois. It will not do for me to stop to detail it to you. You know when we were driven from Missouri the kind sympathies of the people in Illinois received us among them, and we went through the counties there. Brethren took up farms, went to work, and labored in every way, and the truth was spread everywhere. A good many strong men in the Church embraced the Gospel in that period, and have grown up with us and established their seed in righteousness upon the earth.

This has been the way of the Lord with us. When we were scattered from Illinois, we came out here, and our enemies thought they had got rid of the plague of Mormonism. The Lord led us. See how kind He was about it! Behind a frowning providence He hid that blessed smiling face. When He saw the horrors of war were coming, and that the revelation given to the Prophet Joseph at Christmas, 1832, must be fulfilled, He in His mercy would not have us stay there and be mixed up in that fratricidal war. In His great love for us, He allowed us to come upon us and demand of us that we should leave the country, just in time to save us from going into the ranks of bloody strife, laying down our lives, and perhaps many placing ourselves in the position that we could not make an acceptable offering unto the Lord in His holy temple. David, the man of God, because he was a man of much blood, was not allowed to build the temple; but God in His mercy spared us this terrible stain by bringing us out here.

Here for many years what a great peace we have had! When the Lord made President Young to be our Governor, then were we happy. We only wanted to know the will of the Lord, we did it, and were prospered. The earth under our feet was blessed to us continually. Our hearts and our homes were sanctified. The earth, having rested for ages, brought forth its strength to us, as we in the states knew nothing about.

After awhile we had to put up with a good deal of unpleasantness from our red brethren, the Lamanites. When emigrants traveled across the continent they considered they were doing God service in killing the red men. Then in turn the red man's revenge was spent upon our brethren. By and by a Governor was appointed to come among us who determined that we should no longer have the public arms, even to celebrate the 4th of July with. The boys must not have swords with which to study sword exercise, and some that had wooden swords were placed under arrest for this childish employment. What was the result of it? Let me call your attention carefully to a consideration of this particular feature, that while in their wrath and in their determination to break down every means that we had for defense and leave the Indians to prey upon us, the heavens understood this, and turned the wrath of the Indians away till we have never had occasion to get up an Indian campaign since.

Is not the goodness of God manifest in this providence, when it was determined that we should have nothing to defend ourselves with? Certainly it is, and the Latter-day Saints who contemplate it must consider it as a manifestation of God's great kindness to us. He had not forsaken us; but with the taking away of these arms has been taken away apparently every vestige of ill-feeling on the part of the savage around us, and instead of their showing hostility to us, they come to the Presidency, who counsel them to keep peace among themselves and with the whites, and stop the shedding of blood. This excellent advice has preserved the lives of many people, as well as maintained a better and stronger relation between them and ourselves.

Behold, brethren and sisters, the goodness of God in these things! The Lord is continually with us; and although it was not in His providence that we should be scattered from here and driven forth on the face of the earth again, still the trials and sacrifices which pertain to our holy religion can be applied to us here. He allowed our enemies to thicken the very atmosphere with lies and falsehoods concerning us, and we had not the power to prevail against them, and in their turn to oppress us in the exercise of our religious views to a considerable extent, until the prison walls enclosed many of our brethren.

Now concerning the time that we have here at present. The Lord has said that He would soften the hearts of our enemies from time to time, that His work might go on and prosper. From the time of hard frost and kind of winter that we have had in these matters, the Lord has caused a pleasing change, like spring time, to come over us. I want to call your attention to a particular feature in this matter, which it appears to me is desirable for us to consider with care. There is a feeling with us, to a great extent, and it exists today more particularly in the outer settlements, that they would rather be entirely by themselves and excluded from the society and institutions of those that are not of our faith. This is very natural, after all the experience that the Saints have had. But I wish to tell you, it does not do for us to do like the snail—to coil ourselves up in a shell and have it to ourselves, and let those around us and in our midst take care of themselves. The Lord has brought us out here, put us among these hills and mountains, and placed these temples here, in order that we may make our light to shine to the nations of the earth. It appears to me now that we associate in political matters with many men who are not of us in religious faith, and our sisters associate with many of the ladies of the nation of honorable and high standing, that we should consider that this is a peculiar condition which God wishes us to be exercised in, that we are here as a light set upon a hill that cannot be hid—not to be put under a bed, nor under a bushel, but that it is placed upon an eminence, where it can be seen.

This Temple that is now nearly ready, we resolved at the last Conference should be finished for dedication by next spring's Conference, and I am certain that it will. Our resolution, united and strong as it was when we sat under the walls of that building, cannot be broken and we expect to see the house dedicated in a short time. Then we shall have four temples in the one Territory of Utah, shedding forth their light, blessing, illumination and glory to the minds of all who enter therein in faithfulness, in humility, and in dutiful obedience, to help to prepare deceased relatives that they may come unto Christ, that they may be among the number that shall be gathered in Christ from the heavens, when He shall come in fulfillment of this prayer and this revelation.

We should be prepared to associate with the men that come among us in a good and proper way, be honest, pay our debts, and do as good neighbors and good friends to humanity should do. Our examples should be such that people among us should take cognizance of us, and that they should be led to feel, when they contemplate us and our mode of life, that we are the children of God. Not that we should go with them into their saloons, or into their places of diversion, wherein they forget God and defile His Sabbath, or profane His holy name. But that, in all our necessary associations with them, we maintain the Gospel and let the light of it shine forth in our conduct, that we be among them as the salt of the earth. The Savior has said, Ye are the salt of the earth; and if the salt loses its savor, wherewith shall the earth be salted?

I wish to call the attention of the brethren and sisters to this matter, that they should not maintain this exclusiveness too rigidly. When people come among us—and the Lord is sending everybody among us—we should be able to treat everybody with propriety, and let them see that we understand all they know of the Gospel, and very much more. Unless we do this, we cannot emit that light to those that are among us; and if we do this, there will be here and there those who are honest in heart that will embrace the faith, and they who will not will be without excuse. It is necessary that we should be thus mixed up in these various capacities, and people sent among us, that they may be acquainted with us, in order that we may by association impart to them the virtues that we possess, but not that we should imitate the vices which they may bring with them into our midst.

Herein we know the brethren sometimes feel confused and scarcely know what is right; but, my brethren, this is another lesson from the Lord to each and everyone, that they may find out what is right. If you are of a doubtful heart and do not know the way to do this or to do that, go and find your secret places; find your way into the closet; get one, if you have to make it out of the asparagus and the willows, and ask the Lord for His Spirit to give you judgment and to understand whether you shall do this or do that, whether you shall join this or the other, that in every occupation and pursuit you may take such a course that you shall look back upon in times to come and feel thankful that you did as you did, and not look back with sorrow or regret at what you have done and wish you had done some other way. This is the course that all who are dutiful should take. They should learn that it is their duty to obey the Lord, hearken to His counsel, and walk in the ways of life. For a great many hardly know the way that would be satisfactory to themselves and those they are associated with. Then is the time to seek thy closet, "And when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret, and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly," by leading you to take a proper and faithful course, that you will ever look upon with pleasure and satisfaction.

We are living in a day when a great deal has to be done before this revelation and prayer can be answered. We seem to be going at a very slow rate in propagating the Gospel among the nations of the earth. But the Lord has said that He will cut his work short in righteousness. He has promised that He will hasten it in His time. Some have wanted to know how it was going to be done, and I wish to mention some little pertaining to this matter. The Book of Mormon is now translated and published in about ten different languages—the English, the French, the German, the Italian, the Welsh, the Spanish, the Danish, the Swedish, the Hawaiian, the Maori and the Dutch. It is also translated into the Jewish tongue, and I believe is translated into, but not published in, the Hindustani—a language that extends over a vast area of territory on the other continent.

Now, what good are these doing if thousands of copies are lying on the shelves of our offices, as was told us yesterday, instead of being brought out and put to use? In 1851 there was a great exposition got up in London, the first of the kind that is now quite common in the earth. It was held in Hyde Park; I was there on a mission at that time, and I went and visited it. It was 1,851 feet long, allowing a foot for every year, and it was devised by the noble Prince Albert. Soon, there being such a spirit of national importance connected with it, France had to have one, the United States had one, and it has been followed up occasionally by the different nations. Now we have come to a time when in 1893 we expect, Providence permitting, that there will be a world's exposition in the United States, looked upon as the leading nation, foremost in enterprise, foremost in liberty; and people will come from every one, as far as practicable, of the great nations of the earth. If it shall prove a success it will be but a few years till other great nations will want world's expositions.

The seven thousand Seventies that we have in the Church—for be it known the Presidents of the Seventies are everywhere ordaining people into the Seventies, and they have over one hundred quorums—may well be looked upon as the bone and sinew of Israel. Suppose these quorums should work up this matter, and consider that something rested upon their shoulders to get the Gospel to the nations of the earth, and should get up a department at one of these great expositions—say next year—and have all these different translations of the Book of Mormon in that exposition. When the visitors come up, say from St. Petersburg (they will not let a Mormon go into that empire to preach the Gospel), but the Czar will have some of his ministers at the exposition, who may be glad to get hold of the Book of Mormon. They can read it either in the French or German, and carry it over to the old country, and it would be sure to burn wherever they laid it down till some honest heart got hold of it and found out what it contains.

We have not got the book in the Slav language, nor in the Chinese, but we have the Spanish translation. There is not only this Spanish, but there is the Italian, and between the Spanish and the Italian, nearly all the Latin nations, particularly all those that occupy South America, that can be at this exposition can take this Book of Mormon home. If the Elders cannot go to them they will be doing themselves a good turn to come up to the land of Zion and get the word of the Lord and take it home with them. When we come to the eastern continent there are the French, the German, the Danish, the Swedish, the Italian, and they can take them home to their countries. If there is only someone on hand when they are wanted to remind them that there is a chance to have them. Just as sure as there are honest hearts there, the Lord will stir them up by dreams or manifestations of some sort, until they get to know the truth in their own languages.

It seems to me that we are making slow work of the spread of the Gospel to the nations of the earth. The Lord says He will cut His work short in righteousness. Does it not look as though He knows how to do it? Make the nations come up to the land of Zion, and there by change and interchange with one another, get the way open so that the Gospel can be sent among them. Concerning this North America, we have the English language; then the Spanish to work in the Mexican country and on the western coast, where they are more cosmopolitan; and it looks as if the Lord was opening up the way for the Church to send the Gospel to the nations of the earth one way or another. I feel that this is the great work that is upon us, to send the Gospel to the human family, to give them the chance to get out if they will from governments and laws which are so strict that we cannot go with impunity among them.

We live in a time, as I before remarked, in which we have to look forward to the accomplishment of great purposes. We are now nearly closing this century. How wonderfully hath the Lord wrought! Motive power has been discovered, invented and improved upon, until, where it used to take months to cross the Atlantic, it can now be crossed in about six days. We have been blessed, too, with the communication by electricity, wherein we get word now from almost round the world so instantaneously that it is said to neutralize space and time; and we talk 50 or 100 miles apart with each other by the telephone, just as if we were in the next room. What will the Lord do in the next 50 years? Let us open our eyes to this subject. Let us consider well the work that is on hand, and let us try and conform ourselves to the wondrous times in which we live.

I would exhort you again, my brethren and sisters, that you forget not how to pray, to pray in the language of this revelation that I have read to you, that His kingdom may go forth upon the earth and may be made ready for the kingdom of heaven to come down with Him when He shall come to the children of men upon the earth. I do not need to tell you that this is the work of the Lord—you know just as well as I do. You have found out by the same general experience that I have found it out; and now, having found it out, it is our duty to lay hold of it and live according to it. May the Lord help us to do so, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

A GLIMPSE OF SALT LAKE'S "CHINATOWN."

Salt Lake City has in its very center a "Chinatown." Not such a one by any means as San Francisco possesses, but one that is more numerous in habited, perhaps, than any other district of the same size within our borders. About three-fourths of the Chinese population of Salt Lake—whose numbers nearly four hundred—live within it. But how, few people have any idea.

A few nights ago, accompanied by one of the best detectives of the West, I made as complete a tour of that section of the city in which the fellow countrymen of Confucius, the philosopher, reside as it is possible under ordinary circumstances. Of course, the trip was not undertaken until long after nightfall. Except for the uncertain glare of an electric light here and there, the city was in total darkness. Business of a legitimate character was over for the day and the utmost stillness prevailed in those sections immediately surrounding the Chinese quarters. Only the measured tread of the policeman walking his beat broke the silence. Quietly, cautiously, and closely watched we made our way among the old shacks in the interior of the block bounded by Main and State and First and Second South streets. Here is Salt Lake's Chinatown, and our presence in it at midnight caused the Mongolians to regard us with distrust. Always suspicious of the movements of "Melloaus" in their midst, they appeared doubly so on this occasion. As we cautiously tripped up and down rickety stairways and along dimly lighted passages eyes as black as night itself would flash out upon us from all directions and an alarm of our approach would be sounded. Instantly lights would be extinguished, keys would be turned in their locks, bolts be slipped into their sockets and bars be placed in position across the doors. Further progress in such cases was impossible. There was only one thing to do, and that was to retreat and make an attempt to enter an adjoining building.

Our main object was to visit their opium dens and gambling resorts. We knew that while our undertaking was not necessarily hazardous, it was very difficult, and that we could only be successful by exercising the greatest degree of caution. To obtain admission to the principal joints was not an easy matter. Vigilant and surly sentinels closely guarded the entrance which either led into large underground apartments or to peculiarly well protected rooms on the second and third floors. No one was admitted without giving the password or countersign. These of course we did not have and therefore were compelled to resort to other means. "John" is passionately fond of playing his national game "fan tan;" he loves the dreamy sensation which follows the smoking of opium; but he covets money more than either of these, for with it he can enjoy them both. So with a few pieces of silver slipped into his itching palms and the assurance that we would molest none of the inmates we were given the sign of admission and allowed to pass without further interruption.

On the interior we were greeted by the proprietor, an emaciated individual who might have been thirty or fifty years of age for all that we could tell. At first he eyed us suspiciously but his distrust was soon superseded by confidence. A description of this place will give the reader an idea of what most opium dens are like. In the centre of the building were two large rooms filled with tables around which sat probably one hundred Chinamen engaged in playing "fan tan" and other Oriental games. Around these two spacious apartments, forming a square, were dozens of small rooms each having three tiers of bamboo bunks, one placed directly over the other as in the fashion in a miner's cabin or on board a ship. Upon each of these lay a Chinaman on his right side with his feet drawn up towards his chin forming a semi-circle in the center of which was an opium lamp, the yellow flame of which was scarcely able to penetrate the cloud of stifling and nauseating smoke that filled the place.

The work of preparing the pipe for use was an interesting one to us. The pipe is a polished stem or joint of bamboo about twenty-four inches in length and is often uniquely carved and costlily, being mounted with silver or gold according to the wealth and fancy of the owner. At the lower and slightly larger end is an earthenware bowl, sometimes flat but generally rounded. In addition to the pipe the requisites to an opium smoking "kit" are a small wooden receptacle—about the size of and strongly resembling a student's pocket wooden inkstand—whom, when full holds $1 worth of first-class opium; a number of small wires which at a first glance might be mistaken for ordinary knitting needles, a cup of water and a sponge which is used to wipe off the bowl. With this outfit the poppy seed is happy but with it he makes himself miserable and his life a burden, the earthly existence of which eventually ceases out with his lamp.

We closely watched these wretched creatures as they would take one of the small wires and dip an end of it into the miniature box described and draw forth all of the opium (which is about the color and thickness of cane molasses) that would adhere to it. Then the smoker would hold it over the flame exercising the greatest care as he did so that it did not overheat or burn. The fire causes it to expand to an extraordinary extent and form into a bubble which looks very much like a diminutive hot air balloon. A considerable quantity of steam generates within during the process and as the bubble is rolled upon the bowl of the pipe it escapes and fills the space immediately surrounding with a stinking odor which, strange to say, is quite different in its effects upon the olfactory organs from the smoke itself. The operation of heating and rolling is quietly and patiently pursued for a period of two to three minutes, by which time all the liquid properties of the extract have been evaporated and the substance converted into a soft and gummy though not sticky state. The opium is now in a condition for smoking and with the needle it is (with a hole pierced through it) put directly over and around the hole in the bowl of the pipe. If, as it gradually cools, after being rolled the opium again sticks to the wire the heating and roasting process must be repeated.

The smoker now inserts the stem of the pipe in his mouth, holding the opium over the flame, and with a deep and long drawn inhalation fills his lungs with smoke. Three or four draughts consume the entire bolus and each is accompanied with a peculiar wheezing sound. The smoke is emitted in huge clouds from the nostrils, the mouth being used only for inhaling.

In less than a minute after smoking commences the pipe is emptied and then the process of "loading" is repeated three times. During this time the fumes have been gradually spreading through the respiratory organs and are absorbed by the blood. Its effect now becomes rapidly visible. The eyes lose their lustre and have a dreamy far away look, the lower jaw droops, the muscles relax, the hands drop and with them the pipe. The body lies limp and motionless as death in the powerful clutches of the nerve-killing demon. The only signs of animation are rather irregular though not labored breathing and an occasional fleeting and unnatural smile. Poor slave! Though his body is now bound by a vice that has made millions of his fellow-countrymen miserable, groveling and despicable wrecks of humanity, he cares not. His own mind is temporarily freed from the cares of this world and is wafted away on nepenthe fumes to a limitless dreamland. It is said that his mental wanderings are of an indescribable pleasant character; that he beholds nothing but a series of enchanting pictures of beauty and joy. This would seem to be true, but when the inevitable and terrible awakening comes his dreams are found by him to have been but interludes during which poisoned fancy has played panoramic performances on his stupified senses. Then remorse takes possession of the mind and pain the body. These are the results of opium smoking and if the victim has long been a consumer of the drug he awakens slowly and with effort. He sees what appears to be a perpetual phantasma before him; hideous creatures and objects annoy him beyond endurance and he again seeks solace in the pipe.

Sick and almost sleepy ourselves from inhaling the poisoned air of the murky den we sought the street. The night was a chilly one and a few minutes' walk in the open air soon revived us. We had not yet finished our tour, however, and we next ran up a creaking stairway of an old fire trap, turned to the right, knocked at a door and were admitted by a Chinese woman. Though somewhat startled, she asked no questions as she was acquainted with the detective who assured her that I was only a friend. We were greeted by her husband who was lying curled up on a matted couch on the opposite side of the room with an eighteen month old child asleep in his arms. Our conversation aroused the little one from its slumber and it began to cry and refused to be pacified. We offered it candy, nicknacks and nickels, but it was of no avail. It had evidently made up its mind to cry and continued to bellow lustily. A score or more of Chinamen popped their heads in at the door to ascertain the cause of the disturbance and when they saw us they disappeared instantly and one of them frightened the others almost out of their wits by telling them that we were San Francisco custom house opium sellers. The woman, however, soon disabused their minds of this idea. In the meantime her husband had succeeded in quieting the little one by folding it in his arms as he lay upon the bed and allowing it to inhale the fumes of opium as the smoke was emitted in dense volumes from his own nostrils. The child drew the smoke into its lungs in a manner that was truly astonishing. "Oh, he likes smoke, too," laughed the father when we expressed our surprise and horror at the performance.

Understanding that confirmed opium votaries are generally childless, I asked the father how long he had been an habitual smoker and he replied, "One year." He stated further that he consumed one dollar's worth of opium every twenty-four hours. His habitation was a perfect picture of poverty and woe. Wretchedness and misery were stamped upon the countenances of the entire family, which consisted of the parents and three children. When I saw the terrible destitution that prevailed there I asked the Mongolian if he would not forego the awful habit in order to better provide for his wife and children, and he muttered as he continued to smoke away at his pipe, "Me no can do that. I die if I no smoke." And he no doubt told the truth.

Most of the Chinamen in this country, it is claimed by dealers in opium, smoke a superior article of the drug while the majority of opium smokers in China are too poor to buy the best and consequently get what they can—a vile adulteration. The habit is more widespread in this country than is generally imagined. Even Americans indulge in it to an alarming extent. They are, as a rule, however of the criminal classes. A close observer can detect them on the streets by their ashen complexion, sunken and expressionless eyes, spare forms and feeble walk. Several such characters were engaged in smoking in one of the places we visited. It is claimed by some that opium can be moderately used without ill effects. Those who thus contend are unquestionably mistaken. The best informed physicians say that it cannot be taken constantly in the slightest degree without soon making visible ravages on the system. A man who contracts the habit soon becomes indolent and useless, losing all business tact and enterprise and finally becomes a slave, a disgrace and a pitiable wreck. No reliance whatever can be placed upon the word or honesty of such a man. He is an object who shuns and is shunned by society. Moral degradation and ruin have overtaken him.

Home is no longer home. Business—he has none. He is hopelessly enthralled, spending his time smoking more and more. The desire for food vanishes and he draws temporary strength from the pipe. His form becomes drawn and pinched, his skin tight and shriveled, his eyes a sickly yellow. There is a terrible gnawing at his vitals. His strength decreases daily until he grows too weak even to smoke. He then falls back upon his miserable pallet and dies in such agony as would cause the stoutest heart to quail.

It is estimated that about thirty per cent of the Chinese in the United States are confirmed opium sots. As a commercial commodity the extract is a well paying article. San Francisco is the opium smoker's Mecca of America. There he revisits in his day and night and gives no end of trouble to the police. He makes opium smuggling as well as smoking a part of his business. The vice there finds its way secretly into the magnificent palaces of even rich Americans, though my guide, who has spent considerable time investigating the opium traffic in that city, says that such cases are gratifyingly rare. There as here, he says, it is generally only depraved white people who use it, but they are numerous.

Statistics show that nearly if not quite half a million pounds of opium have passed through the hands of San Francisco custom house officials during the last eight years, to say nothing of the enormous quantities smuggled into the country along the Pacific coast unseen and unheard of. It is further estimated that 120,000 pounds of opium are consumed by smokers west of the Rocky mountains annually, most of it in San Francisco, of course.

In 1883 the tariff was raised from $8 to $10 per pound on smoking opium and $1 per pound on opium in its crude state. This duty remained in force until the McKinley bill went into effect when it was raised to $12 per pound for all kinds of opium. Notwithstanding this enormous tax the trade continues unabated. Last year more than three-fourths of a million dollars were paid as opium duties in San Francisco alone.

I have been informed by a number of Chinamen that most of the opium used in this city comes here via British Columbia. That a great deal of it is smuggled there is no doubt. One Chinese store—and there are a number here—it is said, is now carrying a stock of eighteen hundred pounds of opium.

Opium, as is well understood, contains valuable medicinal properties and is the dried juice extracted from the urticary capsules of the white poppy the botanical name of which is Papaver somniferum. The plant is an annual and is supposed to be a native of Asia. It is extensively cultivated in India, Persia, Asiatic Turkey and western China. It is also grown to a limited extent in southern Europe. It varies in height from one to six feet, and is branched and has dark-green ovate-oblong sessile leaves. In India the business of raising opium is a government monopoly and yields an annual revenue to the imperial treasury of between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000. The profitable cultivation of the poppy requires the very best soil.

The seed is planted in India early in November. It flowers in January and in February the capsules are ready for the opium extractors, who, with a notched instrument resembling a saw, go through the fields making incisions in them. A milky fluid oozes out and dries on the surface from which it is scraped off the following day. It is then transferred to an earthen mould where it is formed into a kind of cake, after which it goes through a curing process for three or four weeks, at the expiration of which time it is ready for the market. What is known as the East India company first introduced the drug into China. The latter government protested vigorously. She even exhibited her displeasure by seizing English vessels loaded with the drug and destroying their cargoes. England resented and war followed. China was beaten and as an unwilling compromise legalized the trade that is annually ruining untold millions of her subjects.

NEMO.

A NORWEGIAN GOVERNOR.

The constitutional inhibition upon foreign-born citizens becoming President or Vice-President ends at that point; they may be and have repeatedly been in the President's cabinet, while there are numbers of them always in the Senate and House of Representatives. We are not advised that any state in the Union has a similar provision and believe that none of them has; while it is certain that many of them have had governors who were not only not to the manner born as regards the state but to the United States as well. It has been left to Minnesota to present to the country the first instance of a native Norwegian being placed at the head of a commonwealth, it having chosen one to that position on Tuesday last. His name is Knute Nelson and his majority of 10,000 or more was a very large one, especially when we consider that the land nearly all slid the other way. Mr. Nelson is practically a thorough American in appearance and otherwise; he speaks our language without impediment, is fairly educated in it, and is a politician of considerable experience and attainments. He was a member of the lower house of Congress in the latter part of President Cleveland's administration when the Mills bill was before that body, and to the astonishment of at least some of his political associates, voted for the measure. He thus enjoys another unique distinction in this country—that of being a Republican "free trader."

PRESIDENT HARRISON.

It is to the credit of the American people, and particularly that portion which belongs to the party victorious in the late election, that amid the wild rejoicings and the day enthusiasm over their triumph they have with almost entire unanimity accorded President Harrison respectful and friendly treatment. There have been a few instances—we have heard of one or two in Utah—where speakers at justification meetings have undertaken to allude sneeringly to the chief magistrate, but in every case so far as reported such allusions have been received with cold displeasure by the audience, and the ill-mannered orators have met the silent but none the less effective rebuke that they merited. No matter how widely at variance with some ideas of policy and government he may be, the fact remains that he has occupied during nearly four years, and still occupies, the highest office within the gift of man; a distinction and an honor that, apart from any characteristics of his own, will not be denied to him by any save those destitute of taste and breeding.

But President Harrison has other claims upon the consideration of his fellow citizens than those which merely rest upon his occupancy of the White House. According to his lights he has performed his duty faithfully and in the main acceptably. He has brought to his high office sincerity and integrity. In himself or in his administration there has not been found a taint of scandal. Affairs have been managed with cleanliness and patriotism. Mistakes he may have made, and some of his acts have not escaped sharp criticism; but he has given proof of a sincere devotion to Americanism and a strong desire to promote the national weal. In his home life there has been a sweetness and a simplicity that has warmed the popular heart, and in his recent bereavement he has shown the world how to be manly in the deepest sorrow. Political enemies admit that his course has been singularly upright and conservative, and none can point to a crisis which found him inadequate.

It would therefore seem that in these days of his domestic bereavement and political disappointment he deserves from others besides Republicans a generous feeling and a hearty display of sympathy, esteem and respect.

A NEEDED AMENDMENT.

All the voting done in New York on Tuesday last was not for Presidential electors or state officers by any means.

A consequential feature of the balloting was the determination by such means whether or not the constitution of the commonwealth should be amended; so it was in California and we believe one or two other states. In the first named the amendment voted on was probably adopted, and it would be a good thing if it could be made universal because, as it seems, some method for determining contested election cases other than by mere partisanship is one of the crying needs of the times. The text of the amendment is as follows:

The election return and qualifications of any member of either house of the legislature when disputed or contested shall be determined by the courts in such manner as the legislature shall prescribe, and such determination, when made, shall be conclusive upon the legislature. Either house of the legislature may expel any of its members for misconduct, but every person who receives a certificate of election as a member of either house, according to law, shall be entitled to a seat therein unless expelled for misconduct or ousted pursuant to a judgment in a court of competent jurisdiction.

This is declared to be a consequence of the late struggle over contested election cases in the New York legislature and in some cases reached the courts after the members of that body had acted upon it, each of course in accordance with his political predilections; whether they or any of them took the circumstances of the cases or the justice of the situation into account, it is not for us to say, partly because we don't know and partly because it is not material; the principle itself is wrong and, as such, ought to be abolished.

It is declared by a contemporary that the "growth of contests and the scandals with little regard to the actual vote cast and at the will of a party majority are far worse than the gerrymander. In state after state members fairly elected have been denied the right to seats or ousted from them after taking possession, and this has always happened for some partisan purpose. In the House of Representatives at Washington the decision of contested cases has long come to be recognized as something disgraceful to us as a nation and most injurious to us politically. It is now admitted everywhere by reasonable people, solicitous for fairness in politics and decency in the strife of parties, that these contests should be referred to the courts. The transfer of this prerogative from legislative bodies and the creation or designation of tribunals for the purpose ought to be ordered in every state."

Few there be who can dispute the conclusions arrived at, even if they are in a position to deny the statements contained. The matter is generally made worse by the practice in vogue of paying the contestant, whether successful or not, and so with the contestee. Being in no danger of losing anything in a financial way the unprincipled candidate with just a shadow of justification can bring a contest for the place to which the people did not elect him, and if his party happens to be in power the chances largely favor his success; indeed, it is almost unanimously the case that this has been the result. But supposing this should not happen through its being too glaring for even his partisans, or the other party being in power, the unsuccessful applicant is generally sent away with no cause for comment on the ingratitude of the republic; his wounded feelings are assuaged with a check representing his expenses and a good deal more.

MARLBOROUGH'S DEATH.

The dispatch which came over the wires on Wednesday last announcing the death of the Duke of Marlborough arrived at a time when the whole country was upside down, so to speak, and we of Utah were sympathetically in the same condition. Under such circumstances no demise of a lesser personage in point of prominence than the Queen herself, the Prince of Wales or possibly the prime minister would have received much attention on this side of the Atlantic, albeit the duke stands nearer to us (by marriage) than most of the British nobility.

Marlborough was several degrees from being a man of rectitude or even common morality. His repeated liasons and almost continuous debauchery lost him the recognition at court to which his rank entitled him, and which he enjoyed until Victoria and even Albert Edward were compelled to "cut" him. He was drowned in debt and his residence, Blenheim palace, would have gone out of his hands at public sale but for the English law of entail, which holds it in the family. It was going to rack and ruin, and would doubtless by this time have been unfit for occupancy, had he not made an arrangement with an infatuated American woman and several times millionaire, Mrs. Hamersley, of New York, to supply the needed funds in consideration of his bestowing upon her the title of duchess; of course marriage was an indispensable incident to this affair, but only an incident most likely. "Society" was surprised and the "Four Hundred" had an abundance of enjoyable gossip on hand when the news of the happy nuptials was sprung upon the country four years ago last June. The marriage was performed by Mayor Hewitt, the bride immediately began preparations for her journey to England, while the bridegroom got scandalously drunk as usual and remained so till the next morning. The new wife, as a first investment, spent $750,000 upon the palace and thus rescued it from impending ruin, and it is probable that since that time she has disbursed as much more in the same way, to say nothing of what supporting such an establishment, its lord and master and herself properly have cost her. All this comes to an end now, for the duke's eldest son by his former marriage (his first wife is not dead but divorced) succeeds to the estate by the implacable decree of English heredity. So that Mrs. Hamersley (that was) has perhaps paid a million dollars a year for the privilege of supporting a foreign family's name and keeping its possessions from the worms and moths, and now it all goes from her to that family without remedy.

The duke was the eighth in order who has held the title here. He was middle-aged and not bad looking; he leaves a daughter and three sons, all by his first wife. He was educated, intellectual and talented, fond of books, but fonder of roystering and having a wild time among congenial spirits in the middle classes of society. If he had been born poor and not afflicted with the curse (as it proved to be to him) of nobility, he might have become a useful citizen and a shining light in the world; but little made him indolent and indolence was palliated by excesses which brought debt, disease and at last death at a time when he should have been in the heyday of life. It is doubtful if one pitying tear fell upon his bier, if one friendly hand placed a flower upon his grave, if one kindly thought will be turned upon his life. Thus perish those who court the vanities of life in preference to its fields of usefulness, who make of living a means of constant reproach to nature and its Author, and who seek succor from a reproachful conscience in the pernicious pleasures of the day.

THE USES OF MYTHOLOGY.

A play was presented on the stage of the Salt Lake Theatre last week the plot and incidents of which were absurd in the extreme, and doubtless caused some of the more sober-sided to wonder how the human family could be educated down to the point of patronizing and enjoying such performances. The super-sensitive and hypocritical auditors everywhere find something to condemn in everything that is placed before them, but "Niobe" must be a perfect feast for the gratification of grumbling.

This play has its uses, as we suspect all plays have, and they are not all unwholesome. Niobe as a historical character is not, being purely a creation of heathen mythology. She is represented as the queen of Thebes, a thousand years or more before Christ; she was vainly fond of her children, and upon their destruction wept so inconsolably that the ruling powers struck her dumb and motionless, from which the poets evolve the suggestion that she was turned into stone. In the play her petrified body is restored to life by means of the action of a vagrant current from an electric light wire—the midnight of barbarism and the late afternoon of civilization brought face to face! What a grand opportunity for presenting at a glance the monstrous strides which man under the guidance of a higher intellectuality and the light of a superior Power has wrought! This is indifferently done in the play, but enough is presented to make plain, by contrast, some of the shame and delusions of our more advanced life, the hollowness of many of our customs, the unnaturalness of some of our habits and the degree of insincerity and untruthfulness with which our public and private manners have become interwoven. While Niobe, as we know her, never existed, the manner in which she depicts herself is doubtless an approximate reflex of the time in which she is supposed to have lived, and as such is calculated to fill the thoughtful mind with reflection.

Mythology and fable are alike in that, while both are founded in impossibility and their incidents are like the details of a "midsummer night's dream," they point a moral and adorn a tale; literature could not have reached the high, the instructive and the entertaining place which it holds in our advanced civilization without such adjuncts, and they are certainly harmless even to those who esteem them useless.

THE CHURCH PERSONAL PROPERTY DECISION.

As will be seen by a notice in another column, the decree of the Supreme Court of the Territory in the Church case conforms to the decision as rendered by Chief Justice Zane and published in these columns on Saturday last, and authorizes the use of the personal property of the Church, under direction of a trustee, for the building and repairing of houses of worship and the support of the poor. This decision is so clearly in line with justice and equity that it occasions little surprise, yet a great many profess to have prepared themselves for a contrary result and affect to fear that the decision will not be allowed to stand if an appeal be taken on the part of the government. The News does not share this fear. We believe the best sentiment of the country is with the Church in this controversy, and since prejudice and bitterness have had their day, we think the highest court will affirm the findings of the local tribunal. The result thus far certainly vindicates the course of the authorities in resorting to every legal weapon to preserve the property rights in question, and it is a cause of much congratulation all round.

Bishop Hardy, the newly chosen trustee, was seen by a News representative this morning and, as appears from the interview, anticipates no trouble in speedily preparing himself to enter upon his responsible duties.

PRESIDENTIAL RELIGIONS.

It looks as though the Presbyterians would continue to occupy the front seat during four years more, as theirs will still be the "official church" in Washington. Mr. Cleveland is a member of that communion, though he has never been a pillar as has Mr. Harrison. Alluding to the form of religion observed by various Presidents, an exchange discovers that Jackson was the first Presbyterian elected. Polk was baptized on his deathbed by a Methodist minister, but had attended the Presbyterian church out of deference to his wife's wishes. Buchanan was a Presbyterian, and Lincoln, while not a member, worshipped with that flock. Washington, Madison, Monroe, W. H. Harrison, Tyler, Taylor and Arthur were Episcopallians. Jefferson was an agnostic. John Adams, John Quincy Adams and Fillmore were Unitarians. Van Buren was a member of the Dutch Reformed church and Garfield a preacher of the Church of the Disciples. Pierce was a Trinitarian Congregationalist. Grant and Hayes were Methodists. Johnson, though a believer in God, the immortality of the soul, and the inspiration of the Scriptures, was a member of no church.

THE PROPOSED EXTRA SESSION.

There are opinions for and against the proposed extra session of Congress to follow immediately upon President Cleveland's inauguration. The Chicago Dispatch, in an editorial carefully reviewing the situation, concludes that if the calling of such a session was ever a justifiable procedure it is so in this instance. It says the people have literally thundered into the new President's ears their desire to be "emanipated at once" from the "oppressive and piratical exactions of the McKinley bill," language which, coming from an independent paper, may be set down as emphatic at least. Attention is called to England, where a popular revolution bears fruit in two weeks or so; while in this country, if we observe schedule time, nothing can be done before a year from next month; and the earliest time at which the new Congress can get together and settle down to business is more than four months ahead, and only then can it be done by the call of the incoming President. That such call is desired is declared to be the unanimous opinion of the Democratic party.

Our contemporary, however, presents another side to the question, saying:

It is doubtful whether on March 4th the Democrats will control the Senate, as they certainly will a year later, and to elaborate a tariff bill in the House only to have it defeated in the Senate would fatally prejudice tariff reform for years to come. Another serious objection to an extra session is that it would flood Washington with politicians and office-seekers before the new administration could fairly assume control. The result would be that congressmen and government officials would be so hounded by beggars that public business could not be attended to, and the scene would excite the disgust of all parties. It will be seen, therefore, that in respect of an extra session Cleveland is in something of a dilemma.

The Dispatch is in error in saying the Democrats will certainly control the Senate a year after the fourth of next March, unless they control it by that time. No terms of senators expire in 1894, and if new states were admitted there is no absolute or even approximate certainty as to how many of them would go politically; but no matter as to that. The conclusion arrived at is a sound one without reference to the premises. The people of the country have reposed a tremendous responsibility—an enlarged trust—in the Democratic party by giving it a renewed lease of power and practically without opposition, so that it may do whatsoever it will. Of course they expect changes to be made, reforms accomplished; but they are very sensitive and do not care at present to have what they evidently regard as one extreme followed by another. Moderation, consideration and deliberation are three of the abstract nouns which the new administration would do well to adopt as its sign by which to conquer; and from the temper and demeanor of the coming President it is tolerably sure that they will not be overlooked. The country is in no imminent peril, and no great calamity is likely to ensue by letting the laws alone for a short time longer, unless something vicious should be accomplished the ensuing winter, which is utterly improbable; and if it should, the Democrats would be as responsible as the Republicans, for they can effectually block any proposed legislation they want to. Altogether it would seem to be wiser to carefully survey the ground and then make haste slowly—a decision which, according to a New York dispatch in another column, President Cleveland has already arrived at.

HOW THEY TAKE IT.

The manner in which some of the eastern papers speak of the Democratic avalanche is "mighty entertaining reading." The New York Recorder, an extreme and (until now) irreconcilable Republican paper, has it—"Baby Ruth is going to the White House." Another of the same persuasion sees itself down by starting its leader, "What does it matter to the people of this country whether Benjamin Harrison or Grover Cleveland shall or shall not preside over them for the next four years." And so on. On the jubilating side, the New York World comes out the most glaringly, as doubtless it has a right to, as its labors for the Democratic cause have been efficient and ceaseless. For months it has been in the habit of closing editorial articles with the paragraph, "The next President must be a Democrat;" and on the first page of its last Thursday's issue is a life-size picture of President-elect Cleveland, underneath which is the line, "The next President is a Democrat." Most of the editorial articles on both sides are well tempered, inclined to exuberance of tone by one and hopefulness for the future by the other; and in every case, so far as seen, they counsel moderation and rational progressiveness where they counsel at all. This is commendable.

GERMAN PERSECUTION OF "HERETICS"

An instance of religious intolerance in Germany was brought to the notice of the public by the press a few days ago, when a young Protestant theologian was sentenced to several months' imprisonment because, in a pamphlet, he had unmasked the fraud that is being practiced in connection with the "sacred garment" at Treves. His denouncement of the business carried on in the superstition of ignorant masses was called "blasphemy." Hence the severe penalty.

A similar case is now mentioned by the Berlin Post. According to that paper it is the intention of the authorities of the ecclesiastical department to prosecute the celebrated Professor Harnack because this gentleman in lectures and pamphlets expressed doubts about the correctness of the doctrine of the supernatural conception of the Virgin Mary, as popularly understood.

Professor Harnack is no radical enthusiast, but a well-known theologian who is considered among the ablest and most learned of the country. What he says is the expression of an opinion at which he has arrived after years of diligent research, and not even his adversaries dare to challenge his love for truth. But this does not prevent them from clamoring for his punishment as a heretic.

It is hard to understand, on this side of the Atlantic, how any government can feel called upon to prosecute its subjects for the mere expression of an opinion on abstract questions. And it is harder still to understand how the country of Luther and Melancthon can have departed so much from the road of those great champions of free thought and free speech as to make the exercise thereof a crime.

THE CASE OF MERCIER.

Ex-Premier Mercier, the French-Canadian statesman recently tried and acquitted on a charge of conspiracy and attempt to defraud, has been hounded as few men in public life ever were. The press, usually impartial, have been in large number as vindictive and vituperative as that portion of the Canadian government and the populace which brought about his prosecution and, as it now appears, persecution also. In the midst of it all he has preserved a dignified demeanor, waiting patiently for the vindication which came at last, and letting his enemies do their worst. So far as the legal proceedings were concerned, acquittal came from the bench as well as from the jury, the charge of the judge to the panel amounting in effect to a direction to discharge, nothing to substantiate the charges against Mercier having been shown. His friends have urged him to return to the scenes of his former labors, but to this, opposition which comes from a source not to be ignored or underestimated, has made its appearance. The Montreal Herald, for instance, advises him to rest where he is, saying among other things that "there is a wide difference between personal offenses sufficient to justify a criminal prosecution and political errors grave enough to disqualify the offender from being intrusted with grave responsibilities. Of the former Mr. Mercier has not been guilty, according to the decision of a jury of his peers; of the latter he has been convicted by the verdict of the people of Quebec. Mr. Mercier will make a mistake if he does not, fully and unreservedly, accept both judgments."

The Washington Post takes a very different, and, as we think, more correct view of the case, holding that "in the very constitution of human nature, it is hardly to be expected of a man humiliated as Mr. Mercier has been and subjected subsequently to cruel and uncalculated persecution, that he should not make vigorous efforts to rehabilitate himself in the confidence of the country. Hence the late minister will doubtless resume his seat in parliament and enter upon public life again. He has an apparently large following, and by the use of his unquestioned abilities may yet become a power and influence in the province. It is reported from Quebec that he intends to take a leading part in the movement for Canadian annexation, which appears to be steadily gaining ground both in Quebec and Ontario."

The dominion of Canada has not at any time been overlooked with public men renowned for their vast capacity and breadth of statesmanship; it has but few today who have shown the general capability of Mercier, and to be deprived of his services altogether is simply to be weakened at a time and in a place where the government most needs strength.

PERHAPS THE LAW MIGHT HELP.

"The melancholy days have come, the saddest of the year." The cold blasts direct from the domain of old Boreas whistle through crevices and howl around corners, while the leaden sky and the sombre atmosphere give notes of fitful preparation for the end of the fading year. It is such a time as makes one's mind involuntarily turn to the coal cellar and estimate as nearly as he may how much of protection against the current inclemency it contains, as well as what the additional amount needed is going to cost him; from which point he is apt to execute a mental flank movement and go directly to his pocketbook for another consultation with an indispensable factor in the proposition.

Salt Lake City is almost if not completely enveloped by coal measures some of which are difficult to penetrate and are therefore reposing in the bosom of the earth as free from the disturbing hand of man and the light of day as they have been since the great convulsion forced them from the gaseous gorges beneath; others are not only exposed but have contributed and are daily contributing to the convenience of mankind hereabout. It is not an exaggerative statement to make, that we have enough for all purposes and to spare right at our doors or so close at hand that but little investment of money or labor is needed to utilize it. At a distance, one familiar with the natural situation would be apt to say that we are very fortunate, only having to go into our back yards, figuratively speaking, and shovel out what fuel we require at any time; he would also be disposed to think that if any one had the temerity to engage in the selling of coal under such circumstances, he must inevitably lose what he invests or do a pauperized business. That all goes to show what wise judges we are of each other.

Of course, if a dealer delivered 2000 pounds every time he sold a ton of coal, he would not realize so much as when he reduces the quantity a few hundred; and his profit would be still further curtailed if, instead of making his load all coal, he permitted some of the un-bittuminous, un-carboniferous associates of coal in its native state, and commonly known as dirt, to remain in the shipment. But, say those who are immediately interested, are not the prices sufficiently high to justify the dealer in giving full measure and excluding the dirt? Even with such falling off from his net gain, would there not, at $5.50 a ton, be enough of a margin left to pay him well, especially in a community of 60,000 people, every one of whom depends upon him and not in the least upon themselves for their fuel? We can only answer in the affirmative, with some doubts as to whether either the question or the answer will accomplish any good in the premises.

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS AGO.

With a full sense of gratitude to all friends and patrons near and far, and with profound thanks to the Giver of all good, for merces and loving kindness beyond power to describe, the DESERET EVENING NEWS today begins its Twenty-fifth year. For a quarter of a century, the busiest and most important period in all the world's history, this paper has endeavored to perform with faithfulness and integrity the part allotted to the public chronicler of current events. Year in and year out, in times of prosperity and of distress, in sunshine and storm, it has paid its regular visits to the homes of its subscribers, contributing to each, as the occasion might warrant, its portion of hope, of encouragement, of amusement, of instruction, and of reproof; never vindictive in pursuing an enemy, never timid in defending the right, never faltering at the call of duty; always striving to be just, always aiming at the highest standard of respectability in itself and of goodness in the world, and always ready to take the part of the oppressed against the strong and haughty. A record such as this—and who shall say the NEWS has not made it?—is surely something to be proud of, in these days of venal, sensational, elaptrap journalism.

In its salutatory, appearing in No. 1, Vol. I, dated November 21, 1867, Editor George Q. Cannon said:

In entering upon the publication of a daily paper, we do so with a consciousness of the responsibilities of the position. To edit a daily paper, and conduct it in a satisfactory manner, is a task of no small magnitude. People's ideas about the style in which a paper should be edited and conducted are as varied as their minds. Each reader has his own taste. If this be gratified, then he is satisfied, and the paper is pronounced a good one. There is a diversity of taste, however, in this community than in any other with which we are acquainted. This is a result of the people's unity, and gives us a degree of confidence that under other circumstances we would not entertain. If we do our duty, we know we may safely trust the verdict of our readers.

In issuing this paper we do not have many promises to make. They are not required. We know what is expected—not promises, but a good, reliable paper—the fearless exponent of the truth—a paper that old and young alike can read with pleasure and satisfaction; in fact, a representative paper. It will be our endeavor to make the DESERET EVENING NEWS such a paper. We bring to our work in this department an anxious desire to benefit our readers and the people at large. Honesty of purpose, truthfulness and diligence, we are convinced will do more towards accomplishing this than any amount of talent unaccompanied by these other qualities.

In publishing the DESERET EVENING NEWS we propose to use the power of the press for good. We know that through its agency mightier results for good can be brought than ever were for evil. That which forms the daily reading of the community must leave its impressions upon them. Their thoughts will, insensibly to themselves perhaps, in some instances, take shape and color from that which they read. To have healthy, sound and high-toned minds, therefore, people should have reading of that character. This makes the position of a journalist a most responsible one. We view it in this light, and while we fill the position, we sincerely hope that no word may ever drop from our pen that can truthfully be viewed as unworthy of this responsibility.

After a lapse of twenty-five years, we find no fitter words than the foregoing to express the present hopes and aims of the DESERET EVENING NEWS; and if at the expiration of the next quarter of a century, our successors shall be able, speaking truthfully, to say as much in praise of our efforts and of the paper as we can say in praise of our predecessors and their work, our hearts' desires will have been satisfied and our measure of success complete.

Shall we be pardoned for casting a single glance back to that cool November afternoon twenty-five years ago today? The writer of these lines had been dignified with honorary employment as paper carrier, his beat being all that portion of the city lying west of East Temple street. Proud in the possession of a riding pony and a warm, blue neck comforter,—for November, 1867, was chilly—he put in an appearance at the NEWS office soon after lunch and made one of the expectant group that waited upon the porch while the editors within, the compositors upstairs, and the pressmen in the basement, labored over the birth of the first daily paper in the mountains. At last the mailing clerk, standing near the spot where the city editor's desk is now located, announced that the carrier force could be supplied. "No 1" was called up (there were but two others); and, receiving instructions as to his district—which included what we now know as the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th and 22nd wards—he was handed sixteen papers, the total subscription list that day in the locality described. Being the first carrier to get away, "No 1" was also the first to begin the delivery; and to Mr. Joseph M. Hammer, then employed in the post office, and residing on the block just south of the present Union Pacific depot grounds, he handed the first paper. Mr. Hammer was waiting at the gate, and he displayed no less agility in retreating than he thought the carrier's pony, which had jumped the deep ditch, was also going to jump the fence, than he showed joy at the sight of the paper.

It was a cold, swampy, cheerless district to travel, and not without its terrors to the timid youth of those days. No railroad tracks then crossed the street—none were thought of. The Utah Central was not yet projected, though it was hoped that the Central and Union Pacific roads, which were already under construction, would be decided upon Salt Lake City as their point of junction. The depot block was little more than a pasture bordered by a morass, its one house being the square adobe still standing in the northeast corner. Within the square were several mounds which to the youthful mind were peopled with the restless spirits of those who remain buried beneath. The prevailing notion that it had been the site of an Indian battle and burial ground was confirmed when, later, the mounds were leveled and large numbers of skulls and bones were uncovered.

Looking through the columns of the first issue, we find congratulations from the southern settlements over the completion of the Deseret Telegraph line; correspondence from north and east; a goodly supply of telegraphic dispatches; crisp locals that read strangely yet familiarly today; advertisements of many whose names are yet familiar, such as Walker Brothers, Kahn Brothers, Taylor Brothers, Woodmansee Brothers, William Jennings, Eldredge & Clawson, Ross & Barratt, and many others, not forgetting the inevitable stray notice. There are few who have preserved copies of the first volume, which is almost worth its weight in gold. Twenty-five years hence, when many of those who read tonight's NEWS shall have crossed the river, their children will be as much interested in a review of this issue as present readers would be in the copy from which we quote. The world moves, and moves rapidly, and we all must perforce move with it.

A WATERWAY WANTED.

The ablest newspaper in the Northwest is the St. Paul Pioneer-Press. It always takes a lively hand in whatever matter most concerns the constituency among whom it circulates. Following this line, it has prudently put away politics for a season and laid hold of some of the business issues before the western people. These it discusses with vigor and intelligence, giving fresh evidence of its earnestness and capacity as a popular champion.

A subject that has received recent treatment in its columns is one that concerns many others besides the citizens of the northwestern states. This is nothing less than the advocacy of a deep waterway from the west which will be extensive enough to admit of the bulk of the east-bound grain being transported during the navigation season. That the western farmer is at the mercy of the eastern railroads in the matter of getting his grain across the continent to the coast, no one will dispute; and that this drama of injustice is played over again year after year, always to the draining of the farmer's profits and the fattening of the railroad companies, is too obvious to require proof. Wherefore, thinks the Pioneer-Press, the agricultural interests of the country demand a canal system which shall complete the transcontinental route of which the great lakes form the most important link. There have been several propositions made by which such a plan could be compassed. Perhaps there may be better ones devised in the future. But it is certain that until some such scheme is carried through the farmer will suffer the natural consequences of the annual congestion at Buffalo and other like points, and will pay the price of escape from it, no matter how unjust that price may be.

It should be one of the immediate labors of the American people to devise and put through some plan for a deep waterway from the West to the Atlantic seaboard. It is not simply a legitimate cause, but an urgent one, and to neglect it is to neglect a practical need. This is the era of great undertakings, and these last twenty-five years have been marked by great achievements. We firmly believe the next ten years will witness the solution of the transportation problem on the plan suggested. Nothing in a practical and economic way could more fittingly round out the century.

IMPUDENT, AT LEAST.

A person signing himself "W. C. Edwards," and dating his effusion from Salt Lake City on the 11th inst., wired the following message to Daniel M. Donegan, who, according to the New York World, is the "Tammany Wisinkie,"—whatever that may mean:

Glory to God! All honor to Tammany! Tuscarora Society, Utah, send congratulations on victory.

Mr. Edwards must presume a great deal upon the ignorance or the shortness of memory of the Tammany Wisinkie, otherwise he would scarcely have laid himself open to the latter's inevitable accusation of hypocrisy. What grounds the Tuscarora society, Utah, has for congratulating Tammany on Democratic victory do not appear. Ever since there was such a thing as a Tuscarora society it has posed and worked as the mortal foe of Democracy. It tried to unseat the Democratic delegation from this Territory to the national convention of the party at Chicago, and was itself kicked out ingloriously for its pains. It did its best to defeat the regular nominees of the Democratic party for Delegate to Congress and for commissioners to locate university lands in this Territory, and again met disaster. It tried to beat the regularly nominated Democratic ticket in Salt Lake County, and succeeded in electing a ticket that is not Democratic at all. If this kind of party fealty entitles Edwards to claim for the Tuscarora society a share in the congratulations indulged in by the Democrats, the market has surely put a sudden and enhanced value upon inconsistency and impudence.

A THOROUGH SWEEP.

We shall have to look back as far as 1840 to find a parallel for the change that has been wrought in this election. No presidential election since that date has carried a revolution of the United States Senate with it, we think, though this may possibly have been the case in 1848. But that was not at all a sweep like this one. President Taylor in 1848 had both houses of Congress against him. President Pierce won a greater electoral victory, but that election changed the complexion of neither house of Congress, nor did the election of President Lincoln in 1860, or of President Cleveland in 1884.—Boston Herald.

The foregoing, while in the main a fair statement of the situation, is misleading in that it does not "tell it all." There need be no qualification of the statement regarding the sweeping character of the Democratic victory last week, especially if, as now seems assured, that party has gained a senator in each of the states of New York, Wisconsin, California, Montana and Wyoming, a clear majority over all of two and a plurality over the Republican party, which now has six majority, of eight votes.

In the elections of 1840 and 1844, resulting in the choice of William Henry Harrison and James K. Polk, respectively, the country was in a state of considerable agitation over the question of retaking Texas into the Union, a large, influential and growing element being in favor of it; and thus a war cloud which might burst at any time was cast upon the land. Mexico was not friendly to the movement; whether she wanted the territory herself or not, the most that she was willing to do was to consent to the continued autonomy of the Lone Star republic. Presidential candidate Polk showed (in 1844) that this would mean eventually the taking of Texas by Great Britain and making it a dependency or province of the crown. It is easy to understand how such a situation could, as it did, overshadow every other and cause the people to leave the hands of the President unfettered by a hostile majority in either branch of Congress or otherwise; hence the elections at the time spoken of logically meant a "complete new deal," under the pressure of a grave issue, and the acts which followed were a faithful realization of the meaning.

Again, it is hardly proper to say that President Lincoln's election did not carry with it a change in the complexion of either branch of Congress. We all know that he was measurably unhampered by political opponents from the beginning of his administration so far as Congress was concerned. Whether this was a direct or indirect result of the election matters not; it is a fact, and all the measures pertaining to the struggle upon the country that his administration desired were loyally responded to by both the Senate and House. This was a revolution so complete, so radical and so sudden that the country could scarcely realize how it was or what it meant for a while. But it should be borne in mind that this great change was the logical result of a ponderous issue, and a darker or more dreadful one than the people had ever before been called upon to face.

It therefore follows that the reaction against the Republican party, which occurred on the 8th instant, is actually without a parallel when all things are considered. It was a time of profound peace and excellent political feeling; the candidates and issues were the same as four years previously, so that scarcely a new thing could be said; the country was decidedly prosperous and the people, while dissatisfied and even riotous in places, were as a whole quiet and free from agitation; President Harrison's administration was satisfactory to the Republican party and devoid of any features to which the opposition could offer any other than political objection; no ruptures or misunderstandings with foreign powers—were threatened or likely; and yet, with this altogether placid condition upon the land, the party in power was hurled from its place and one that had not occupied it for a generation installed at headquarters! The country could go no further without transforming itself altogether.

Our neighboring republic on the south indulges in a revolution every now and then, in which many are killed and much property is destroyed; France has had her present government longer, continuously, than any other during the century; Great Britain casts out its ruling faction every now and then, but this is always because the party in power is defeated on some measure before parliament and the ministers resign in order that the opposition may have its way, the method of administration and the head of the nation remaining always unchanged. It is different here. We have changed (or provided for changing) the executive, the upper and lower houses of Congress, the executive department and the whole plan of legislation all in a day, and without much excitement and no turbulence at all, while our institutions remain intact and unassailed. A greater tribute could not be paid to the Federal Republic or the free people who inhabit it.

RAILROAD BUILDING IN PALESTINE

A correspondent from Palestine says that since the completion of the railroad between Jaffa and Jerusalem, more than three hundred houses have been erected in the latter city, including dwellings, hotels and places of business, and that the country has been vastly benefited by the enterprise. The road is laid through the valley of the sons of Hinnom and passes only a few yards from the pool of Bethesda. Baron Rothschild intends to found another Jewish colony near the railroad and has already commenced the construction of three hundred buildings to be used by the colonists.

It seems to be only a question of a brief time when the Holy Land will be lined with railroads in every direction, with the center in Jerusalem. Already the plan is laid for a road to Samaria and Sidon.

UTAH'S PART IN THE FAIR.

Politics, and even the echoes of politics, having sunk into a state of comparative quietude for the nonce, the community now has time and ought to have inclination to discuss and act upon other matters of present and more weighty concernment. Prominent among these is the subject of Utah's representation at the World's Fair in Chicago next year. The public are familiar with what has been done and in a general way with what is being done by the local managers and commissioners; these are all up to their eyes in business and have the work well in hand. The ladies especially are bringing the potent factors of efficient organization and popular enthusiasm into action, with the result of fully arousing the set, from one end of the Territory to the other, to the importance of thoroughly employing the opportunity that is given them.

While nothing needs to be urged upon the officials in the way of activity, it is evident that upon the part of the people there is room for much improvement. This condition, we are sure, is the result of neglect rather than of disinclination; and it is not likely that anything more than a gentle reminder will be needed to awaken the entire community to its duty in the premises. No citizen ought to feel himself too poor or too insignificant to take a part in making our Territory's display credible and thus spreading her fair fame throughout the world. Whatever of success shall be attained will be due not to the ponderous efforts of the few, but to the whole-souled, united endeavors of the many. Leading men and progressive citizens in every county and hamlet within our borders ought to enroll themselves at once as active workers in the good cause, and by precept and example induce others to join them. There is no section which cannot contribute in some interesting and instructive manner to the completeness and value of the whole display. A Territory so varied as ours in its resources requires that many hands and hearts yield willing service in bringing them properly before the attention; and it would be not only unpatriotic but in a measure ungrateful for us to be content with a meager, imperfect, unsatisfactory exhibit where we ought to have the finest and best in the land.

THE NEWS hopes its readers everywhere will begin right away to take an interest in this matter of legitimately winning renown for Our Mountain Home. They have the opportunity of a lifetime to refute many slanders and slurs against the community. If the exhibit should prove discreditable, all would suffer under the stigma; by making it a grand success all would be partakers of the glory. The occasion is one where Utah can do a great deal of effective missionary work in her own behalf, and this ought to be an inducement to all classes to join hands for once in making the testimony as strong and convincing as is possible for it to be.

A COMPLAINT FROM JAPAN.

It is to be expected that the manner in which many of our American girls "get themselves up," together with their arts and artifices, will now and then receive attention at the hands of the taskmaster and social critic; and sometimes, too, these attentions are timely and instructive, in which case they are eminently proper. But here comes far-away Japan with a denunciation on that subject, aimed at western civilization, the effect of the importation of which is declared to be the ruination of the manners of the Japanese women. A newspaper of Japan, commenting on this subject, says that "on the plea of tediousness and artificiality, the usages of female life and deportment have been dispensed with, and the modern girl, in her attempts to imitate foreign manners, has almost transformed herself into a man. The climax was reached in the case of the girls trained in Tokio female schools. Practices hitherto unknown in Japan have become fashionable among them. Some girls of good families are living alone in lodging-houses; others walk unattended in the streets after dark; and groups of five or six school pupils are to be seen drinking sake or playing cards together at tea-houses." This paper properly enough asks what kind of mothers such girls are likely to make and concludes with the statement that "in the matter of female deportment westerners [ourselves] have nothing to teach and many things to learn from Japanese ladies." True enough. Those of Japan, or some of them, are, it appears, addicted to playing cards and drinking in public houses, and unquestionably we haven't "caught up" in that respect; furthermore, we are quite willing to remain in the rear and respectfully decline the insinuation that the custom came to them from our side of the great pond.

A WORD AS TO THE CABINET.

It has been the custom hitherto, to which there have been but few exceptions, for the new President to appoint to the head of the cabinet the man who received the largest support next to himself in the convention by which he was nominated. If President Cleveland adheres to this plan he will make Senator Hill Secretary of State, or he might pass on to Governor Boies of Iowa or ex-Governor Gray of Indiana. Whether he does this or not, it is a reasonable conclusion that one or both of these last named gentlemen will be called to positions in the President's official household. It should not be forgotten, however, that ex-Secretary of the Navy Whitney is in a position similar to that occupied by Hon. Elihu Washburn when General Grant was elected the first time—that is, he can have whatever he asks for. A good many who claim to be posted say he would rather represent the United States at the court of St. James than have anything else, and if he does so the field will be open for whatever distribution of cabinet honors otherwise Mr. Cleveland may see fit to make. No one can control him in this matter, and we presume no one wants to.

THE DEACON CASE.

Mrs. Deacon is having a hard time of it in France, but if half that is told of her is true, it is no harder than she deserves. The spectacle of a woman appealing to a court of law where men sit in judgment for the custody of her children, is one that ordinarily addresses itself in an irresistible manner to all that is manly, honorable and upright in the sterner sex; indeed, it must be an awfully vile and opprobrious case where the woman sues in vain. Yet such would seem to be that of Mrs. Deacon. The trial court denied her suit and she removed the case to the French court of appeals, where it was heard and submitted yesterday.

Mrs. Deacon is said to be a strikingly beautiful American woman, and is the wife of Edward Parker Deacon. The suit is nominally for a divorce from him, but really it is as stated, the court having awarded the children to the husband and the divorce being practically accomplished. Her amours with her lover, Abella, became so open and shameless that the injured husband could no longer refuse to notice them, and he shot the wronger dead; for this he was tried recently and acquitted.

THE PEOPLE'S PARTY.

General James B. Weaver, the candidate of the People's party for President in the late campaign, has just issued a lengthy address to the voters of that party. It is not in the terms or the tone of the documents usually issued by defeated candidates showing "how it was done" and blaming somebody with all the scolding severity of which the author is capable; but is rather generally considered in the line of a bugle call for the scattered hosts to rally and reform their lines. He presents the cheerful fact that his party ran but little behind the party at present in power as to the number of states carried, thinks it will have the balance of power in the United States Senate and rejoices that it has doubled its representation in Congress, while a number of state governments have been secured. After declaring the Republican party almost annihilated, he proceeds to curtail (as he seems to think) to a great degree the feeling of jubilation which the Democracy feel over their triumph, showing that it was the result of a violent reaction and not of the deliberate judgment of the American people. In this he is manifestly and radically wrong, as any one not infatuated with partisanship can see; for there was no "violence" whatever in the uprising, and everything before and during the election betokened the greatest deliberation, the exercise of as calm and collected judgment as ever characterized any election in the country.

General Weaver proceeds to criticize what the Democrats have done, are doing and are going to do, leaving the Republicans out of consideration altogether, perhaps for the reason that he laid them out so early and effectively in the beginning. He declares that the leaders of the Democratic party are without any well defined policy except contemptuous disregard for every principle of reform. This is simply an extravagant and pointless use of words which amount to nothing as a conclusion. He ought to remember that the principal plank in the Democratic platform is also the principal one in that of his own organization—tariff reform—and that there is not a Democratic leader, scarcely a Democratic layman in all the land, but what is altogether committed to that principle. The general says, in a toneavoring more of prophecy than of logic, that the new administration will ignore the three great contentions of modern times, relating to land, money and transportation. He cannot know that this is the case, even if he really believes it; because, to be just, the record of President Cleveland's first term gives an emphatic negative to such a statement. The land question was one that he paid more attention to than any other, holding as he did that the public domain was held in trust by the government for bona fide settlers, not for huge corporations and private speculators, and in carrying out this policy he has incurred the ire of more people in the West, who looked upon the land as theirs to any extent and for any purpose, than has yet been set down in anybody's vocabulary. We don't say that the President was right in what he did, nor shall it be said that he was wrong, principally because it doesn't matter; the point is whether or not the facts of history bear out General Weaver's forecast, and common justice would seem to make one say that it does not. As to the question of money, that is something which no administration has yet been able to dodge or ignore, and it is hardly probable that the next one will be a record-breaker in this particular; and the same may be said of recent years regarding transportation.

The trouble all through with General Weaver seems to be that he looks at things through the colored glasses of the politician (which he certainly is, and a smart one, too), and not with the comprehensive, unobstructed gaze of the statesman. Personally he is an altogether unobjectionable man, of cosmopolitan tendencies, catholicity of view and of great tolerance for opposing ideas; having become somewhat acquainted with the gentleman, it may be said that we speak advisedly. But neither he nor anyone else need hope to be a ruling power or to head one by denying to others a just meed of praise for honorable service or foretelling what they may do hereafter by baseless if not jaundiced predictions.

The People's party is now a recognized factor in the political economy of the United States. It starts out better than some of the third parties did, gaining more electoral votes for instance than either the Anti-Masonic party in 1852, or the Know-Nothings in 1856. It represents more advanced principles and a less bigoted purpose than either of them, and ought to do better. It should also be borne in mind, in order to establish a thorough analysis, that in no state and but few if any congressional districts could it have been successful without the vote of the Democrat. Look at the result: Wherever the People's party stood alone or opposed the Democracy it has generally failed; where they have worked together success has been the outcome in nearly every case. Is it not so? Then would not General Weaver's exhortation and denunciation of the Democratic party just at this juncture seem to be rather bad politics and in rather bad taste, if nothing more serious?

It is quite probable that we of the West will have to rely somewhat upon the People's party to assist us in obtaining the rehabilitation of silver with the function of full money, since both the old parties are more or less opposed to it. It will thus be seen that the new third party has a high and honorable purpose which should not be disparaged or curtailed through the injudicious adoption of a batch of lame whiffing appeal principally to the rabble. Nothing can be done without means, of course, and as the national government is exclusive in the matter of monetary coinage and issues, what can the People's party or its friends hope to accomplish in the direction indicated for some years to come if it stands by itself and abuses those who might be won over? Four years hence, on a platform whose distinctive features shall be silver redemption—if in the meantime it shall not have been accomplished—the adjustment of national and state traffic and circulation, and kindred matters, that organization might dictate what the government's policy should be, even if it did not actually control. To this end its energies should be bent, and its leaders should be instructed to cease the wiles of demagoguery wherever they are prone to practice them, and cultivate the arts of patriotism and statescraft. Meantime, all hands will watch the movements and achievements of the new party with a great deal of interest, realizing as they do that it is the architect of its own fortunes.

A SURE THING.

Those who were not victimized by means of bets on the Presidential election are not yet out of the toils if they are in a sportive mood at all; the wiles of the "plunger" have not altogether disappeared because the contest is over, he is now on the lookout for other game. One of the "catches" afloat has been worked to some extent in this city; it originated in the East and is thus explained:

Two men came into an editor's office and one of them said:

"Here is the bet we want you to decide: I bet that four months to a day after Cleveland becomes President every national bank in the United States will be closed."

"Yes, that's it," said the other better. "I bet they wouldn't."

"Supposing you wait and see," suggested the newspaper man appealed to.

"But what's the use of waiting?" persisted the first. "Isn't four months to a day from the fourth of March the Fourth of July? Won't the banks be closed everywhere?"

And they went away wrangling, while the newspaper man hid his blushing and ashamed face behind his desk, and the bet still remains to be decided.

THE COAL CRIMINALITY.

Let us hypothesize for a moment.

The majority of the 60,000 residents of this city are in moderate circumstances and have to buy their necessary articles in smaller quantities than the more fortunate few can. With the approach of cold weather they have to purchase more fuel two or three times over than during the summer, and this item thus becomes one of considerable importance to them. If they were able to buy a carload it would be great gain, as they would at least get the benefit of wholesale rates and approximately correct measurement; but they cannot do this and their almost universal resort is to the middleman, whose terms and treatment they must put up with whether it suits them or not. People in want of coal in this weather are not prone to argument over losses sustained or injuries inflicted; they must do the best they can and do it at once, or there will be other injuries which will not be so easily repaired, if inflicted at home.

Suppose we take what seems a fair, average case. A citizen goes to a dealer and orders a ton of coal, which he must have with reasonable dispatch, and pays for it at the time of ordering, otherwise no attention is paid to him; so he hands over $5.50 in cash as a consideration for 2000 pounds of fuel. Most people at a distance, knowing that such an amount is exacted for an article that exists in sufficient quantities to supply the United States and almost within gunshot of the city, would be tempted to ask if there are any grand juries in this part of the country, and if so, if they themselves should not be indicted for non-leasance; but no matter as to that; for the sake of the argument but for no other reason we will admit that the coal is worth the $5.50 paid. After the lapse of four or five days, and the buyer has perhaps been out of coal for say half that time, the fuel is delivered—not the 2000 pounds that he contracted and paid for, but 1500 pounds. This adds $1.37½ to the price; on investigation the buyer finds that about twenty per cent of his purchase is dust and dirt, utterly unfit for any purpose under the sun—except to keep up the dealer's profit; this little circumstance adds $1.10 more to the cost, so that counting nothing as a loss for the two days that he has had nothing to burn, he has paid $7.97½—practically $8—for enough fuel to last him two or three weeks with the greatest economy! This kind of thing does not represent an isolated case here by any means; on the contrary it is quite common, and it is only one phase of the evil.

The railroads first, and then the dealers, have us completely at their mercy. We can get nothing of any consequence to burn except at their hands and upon their terms. Suppose a man has a coal mine of his own not far away but too far to enable him to have its product transported by wagon and team at a profit; the railroad tariff is so prohibitive that it is less of a loss to him to patronize the monopoly outright, and as the lesser of two evils he does so. He realizes that he is being robbed not only by the "protective tariff" of exorbitant freightage, but by those who stand near to the barons and virtually control the whole traffic; but what can he do? If he protests he is informed by the chief and the secondary robber in concert that he is not compelled to take their coal if he don't like their terms and goods, and that is a hard fact—one of those hard, stern facts which sometimes make a people get together and devise means for their own disenthralment. That is what must be done here.

Cheap transportation is of course the only means of untying the Gordian knot. To have this we must have a line of rails and some rolling stock connecting with the nearest coal measure of sufficient proportions to insure a constant supply. This line must be held and owned by the people directly or indirectly; and it must be so arranged that it can never be absorbed by a trunk line or other commercial cormorant. Fifty thousand people in this city would patronize it, at a very low estimate, ten cents a month each, for transporting coal alone, and its other business ought to amount to as much more. Would not $10,000 a month patronage insured for a short narrow gauge road, which need not rush things very much and could be inexpensively conducted after being built and equipped, pay the interest on mortgage bonds and a good dividend besides? Add to this what the foundries and shops, the mills and smelters consume, and then consider the constant increase of population, and the popular railroad begins to look like a little wealth-maker as well as a great equalizer.

There is nothing visionary in the foregoing. It is something that will have to be done sooner or later, and the earlier it is begun the earlier will the hour of emancipation strike. As it is, there is nothing to prevent the barons from doubling their prices, or troubling them for that matter before the winter is over, and we would have to submit to them just the same; the only present recourse is to the law as against the dealers, and when we pay the tribute exacted by the monopolist let us see to it that every middleman who resorts to shrinkage by one means or another is made to answer the same as for any other theft; and compelled to make full restitution besides. And then let us have the movement inaugurated at once looking to relief from further tribute to either the lord of the manor or his squires.

Five dollars and a half for an alleged ton of coal, when there would be good profit in it, even when the measure was honest, at half that figure! Just think of it!

THE HORRORS OF WAR.

A prominent French author, Camille Flammarion, is also something of a statistician and often permits his passion for figures to lead him to strange and unusual lengths. He has lately taken up the subject of the wars of the earth and what they cost in blood and treasure—a subject sufficiently vast and intricate to keep his mind and pen employed for some little time, one would think. He shows how general statistics prove that since the great Trojan war, which occurred about 1100 B. C., not a year has come and gone in which a number proportionate with the destruction there have not been killed. He figures that for those thirty centuries a loss of 40,000,000 in each has occurred, making a grand total up to date of 1,200,000,000, or within about 200,000,000 of as many people as there are on the globe today. He is not satisfied with this monstrous showing, however, but goes on to present the ghastly result of all this killing by the quantity of blood spilt, placing it at 18,000,000 cubic metres! This is enough to keep the Seine—or a river half a mile wide and ten feet deep—running for two whole days!

Flammarion must be a humanitarian and bitterly opposed to war, for the exhibit is not yet gruesome enough to satisfy him; he evidently wants to make the situation so revolting that killing will be talked of no more. He goes on to show that if the 1,200,000,000 skeletons must rise and climb one upon the other, the ladder thus formed would reach the moon, coil about that body, and continuing onward would mount to infinite space four times as far again, that is 500,700 leagues in height. The corpses if thrown into the channel at Calais, would form a bridge between France and England and separate the ocean from the North sea by a weir. If only the heads of the men slaughtered in war were taken and placed side by side, a band would be formed reaching six times around the world. Is not this awful?

It costs, says Flammarion, $7000 to kill a man. From the Crimean war down to that of 1870-71 the civilized nations of Europe and America spent in destroying one another $21,000,000,000. The wars of the last 100 years have cost $140,000,000,000, without counting the sorrow, the loss of men and other results, the last named being, of course, too much for enumeration by even so penetrating and studious a mind as that of the gifted Frenchman. Surely no one but he would think of arranging war statistics in such a fashion, and yet why not? Those who have never been to war, and their number amounts to more now than at any other time in modern history, have no conception of its unmitigated horrors; and such tables as Flammarion's, fantastic and repulsive even though they may be considered, serve a good purpose if they do no more than create a deterrent feeling for the time being.

A QUESTION ANSWERED.

It seems as if every newspaper in the country is periodically asked questions concerning the Presidency and Presidential elections, all of which have been answered satisfactorily or as nearly as could be the case on each and every occasion. Of course everybody does not see these replies and some who do perhaps forget, and thus, like the Prodigal son, they return and, like the erring son's father, the papers make them altogether welcome. The News is again called upon for information regarding the number of times a man can be elected to the Presidency, and while cheerfully answering will give a few words of explanation along with it.

The first Presidential term was held by a man who accepted the place in deference to the undivided wishes of his countrymen—George Washington. The colonies had just emerged from a long and devastating war with the mother country, and in their disorganized and inexperienced condition deemed it wisest to begin the career of independence with the man at the head who had successfully led them through the war. Some historians think they would have placed a kingly crown upon his brow if he had been willing to wear it; but he was independent of his country and would countenance nothing which made of public officers anything more than the people's agents, holding office under such the same terms that employees in the business affairs of life do—that is, when not giving satisfaction they can easily be removed. A more popular scheme for conducting a government could not be devised, republican in its methods, democratic in its essence.

Washington's first term was altogether satisfactory, and he then wished to retire, but the people would not have it so. The confidence in him which his successful conduct of the war had inspired had become strengthened and rooted by reason of his civic leadership, and he was again unanimously chosen. At the conclusion of this term another was proposed, but this time he would not yield, showing the people that an unlimited number of terms for any one would mean service for life, and this, stripped of heretofore in the matter of choice, was equivalent to being the head of a constitutional monarchy, no vestige of which was to be tolerated on this soil. The fact was accepted and respected. John Adams, who had made a good lieutenant under Washington, was given the succession but was not honored with re-election. Then came Thomas Jefferson, who served twice as did also his successor, James Madison and his successor, James Monroe. This election for the second time was, with the exception noted, becoming somewhat of a custom, but it ended with the last named, the people concluding finally that there was no law or rule requiring them to re-elect and that they had as much right in law and logic to confine a man to one term as to give or deny to him that one. After Monroe's second term the drifting so much one way which had previously occurred ceased, the next Presidential contest, with four candidates in the field, resulted in no choice by the electoral college, followed by the House of Representatives choosing John Quincy Adams. He was again a candidate, but was defeated by Andrew Jackson, who restored the two-term practice but did not transmit it, the next six Presidents who were chosen by electors and two who succeeded to the office as Vice-Presidents by reason of death, holding but one term each. Abraham Lincoln then took the office and was re-elected but assassinated a few weeks after he was sworn in the second time, and thus served the whole of the latter term was served out by Andrew Johnson. General Grant served out two full terms, Hayes then had one term, Garfield and Arthur jointly one term, Cleveland one term and was defeated for a second, Harrison one term and was defeated for a second.

From the foregoing resume it will be seen that of late years the people have not taken altogether kindly on most occasions to two terms for the President, let alone more than that. If Washington had adhered to his first resolve and not permitted himself to be chosen a second time, undoubtedly his example would have been followed in that respect, just as we have made what he did do in that regard a limitation beyond which we are not presumed to go. It has become an unwritten law, to violate or override which would not be treason against the government by any means, nor would it of necessity be revolutionary, since there is no written law against it; but it would be a revolt against a cherished tradition, an uprising against what we reverently regard as a sacred precedent, and as such is not likely to be done. It has never, in fact, been attempted but once, that was at the Chicago convention which nominated General Garfield. General Grant's partisans to the number of 308 held together for several ballots trying to secure his nomination for the third (but not consecutive) time, but to no purpose; and if as great and popular a man as he could not succeed in breaking the rule, it is not at all likely that any one else ever can.

A DELIVERER WANTED.

The keynote sounded by the News in the matter of the public grievance against the coal dealers guilty of fraud through short weight, has met with an early and a gratifying response. The grand jury in their final report to Judge Zane yesterday afternoon paid official attention to the matter, and the City Council has under consideration an ordinance having for its object the protection of the community against this class of wrong. The result of the agitation will be that for a time at least there will be no attempt to cheat a consumer by charging him $5.50 for 1500 pounds of coal; under the fear of exposure and of a comfortable fine, it is probable there will be a material increase in carbon-selling honesty—for all of which everybody interested will be duly thankful.

But the good work should not end with this. Honest weight and honest coal are all right so far as they go, but at the rate of $5.50 per ton they do not go far enough. What is wanted is a reduction in price, and this, we take it, can only be secured through the construction and operation and maintenance by local capital of a competing road to the coal beds by which we are surrounded. That a city of 60,000 people, so fortunately situated as we are, in this respect, should be in the matter of fuel so completely at the mercy of foreign and soulless corporations as Salt Lake is, is one of the great mysteries and great blunders of our industrial development. No other case in this or any other country offers a parallel to it. The wise heads among us have long anticipated the condition by which we are confronted; and they have deplored the failure of the various efforts to remedy it. Perhaps if they had been more emphatic in the expression of their views and more energetic in carrying them out, the public might have rallied more heartily to their call; perhaps the masses are more to blame than the men from whom the inception of such projects is expected; perhaps—but why waste time in suppositions? We are paying dearly enough for our shortightedness, and all eyes are looking anxiously for deliverance.

Is there not in the community a man with sufficient courage and enterprise to meet the crisis and solve the problem? If it is too large an undertaking for one man, cannot a combination of men be effected for the purpose? For the party or parties who have the nerve to grapple with and conquer the difficulty there is in readiness a large stock of public sympathy and gratitude—which, it is true, may not be quoted very high in financial reports but is a good thing to have nevertheless—as well as a handsome return and sure dividends on the means put into the investment. Who wants this guerdon, in consideration of the services rendered? First come, first served!

THE FRIENDSHIP that seems to have developed so strongly between President-elect Cleveland and Senator Carlisle is taken to be an indication that the eminent Kentuckian will be one of the potent counselors of the new administration.

A FEW GENTLE REMARKS.

The spectacle presented to this patient community two or three times a week by the gaseous and illuminated body known as the City Council is one to make thoughtful men bite their lips in humiliation and fools crack their throats with unrestrained laughter. Surely, undignified childlike and piddling incapacity could no further go than in the lengths achieved during the past few weeks by what we are unfortunate enough to have for a municipal legislature. The worst feature of the case is the recent activity of mouth on the part of those members whose notorious unfitness for the position has heretofore escaped criticism because they were discreet enough to keep quiet. Of late they have followed the bad example of garrulity set by their colleagues, with the result that the sessions are given up to a dreary mass of rapid and at times ill-natured prattle, from which the most diligent search scarcely succeeds in extracting a grain of sense. If this be called contempt of court, or rather of council, on our part, we shall try to bear with resignation the penalty for at last expressing what we have long been forced to feel.

Yet the News is sure the members of the council are not bad men, some of them are really able, and not one is indifferent to the city's welfare. They doubtless want to do what is right, and probably think they have done the best they can. If this is the case, we apologize here and now; for it is manifestly unfair to blame people for what they don't know. At the same time we submit whether the gentlemen do not themselves think they have already wasted time enough in all conscience to revise five sets of ordinances, and whether they think it a part of their official duties to spend hour after hour wrangling like a lot of boys over a trivial question as to a clerk's letter and its disposal; whether they think they are earning the extra compensation which special sessions bring them; whether they are satisfied with the figure they cut before their constituents and the world; whether in fact they do not think it would be a measure of economy and in the interest of public dignity all round to discontinue the meetings altogether and let municipal affairs run themselves. The News is not hard to please ordinarily, but it admits that just now it thinks almost any kind of a change would be for the better. Hence it rises and in a modest way asks for a change.

TILTING AT WINDMILLS.

A few days ago we took occasion to speak in terms of praise of the ability of the St. Paul Pioneer Press, the foremost newspaper of the Northwest, and one of the best in the country. The journal referred to deserved all that was said of it, for it ordinarily discusses current subjects with acumen and vigor, and generally is not far wrong in its judgment.

The last issue came to hand, however, shows a woeful departure from this high standard. It contains a half-column tirade against the Mormon Church and is in the utmost degree vindictive and vituperative. The masses of the Church membership are called "purbled," they are said to be "of a low standard morally and intellectually," Mormonism is defined as "a horror, at the root of which the knife should cut quickly and sharply," and the sooner this is done "the nation and the world will be rid of what should never have been allowed to raise its snaky head above the mire from which it sprang." There is much more in the same strain, all going to show that the editorial scribe has succeeded in lashing himself into a most virtuous and vehement frenzy.

But the amusing part remains to be told. The whole basis of the screed is found in a ludicrous misunderstanding of Chief Justice Zane's recent decision as to the disposition of the personal property of the Mormon Church. Says the P., in its opening paragraph: "Probably no step that has been taken by the authorities towards the extinction of polygamy has excited more indignation among the Mormons than will be felt with regard to the decision of the Utah supreme court as to the disposition of the two millions placed at the disposal of the Mormon church." Then, as the climax is approached: "It is one of the unpleasant features and a most unpleasant duty, but it is none the less necessary, . . . and the application of the funds to the establishment and support of free schools is the balm that follows the knife. In education is the one hope of Utah, and the whole country should congratulate itself because two millions of dollars, which were to have gone to the making of proselytes to Mormonism, are to be expended in free education."

Now, as it happens that "the whole country," or at least the honorable part of it, will "congratulate itself" that the Utah Supreme Court held a view totally different from that taken by the Pioneer Press, the journal referred to must confess to a large stock of fine fury utterly wasted. The court's decision was that the Church was entitled to the use of its personal funds—the same to be employed in the building and keeping in repair its church edifices and the support of the poor—a direct denial of the unjust and preposterous demand that the means given by members of the Church to a certain cause be diverted to another cause wholly different and none the more worthy. The esteemed Pioneer Press has committed the dangerous and hideously ineffectual blunder of going off half-cocked; and if the editor will devote a moment to examination he will find, in the language of the day, a capacious and jagged hole as the result of this recent exploit of talking through his hat.

HURRYING THROUGH LIFE.

Some men's lives fitly represent a high pressure engine whose capacity for work is kept up to its highest tension and is only stopped long enough to take on water and fuel or for repairs made inevitable by the ceaseless friction of joint against joint and rod against wheel. Some enthusiastic visionaries have expressed the belief that the locomotive, being the perfection of mechanism, approaches so closely the realm of intelligent beings that it partakes somewhat of the conditions approached and that it is really animate to some extent; many an old engineer refuses to have his mind abused on that subject, claiming that his "machine" has its moods, humors and fancies just like "other people" and he always treats it accordingly. Without discussing this absurdity, we will reverse the proposition and say that man is a perfected engine, operated and regulated on much the same principle as the other—the wheels, arms, rods, flues, elbows and pistons having their counterpart in our mechanism; the stroke of the piston rod is merely the striking out with an arm, every revolution of the driving wheel is a step forward or backward, the fire-box is the engine's stomach in which its food is macerated and the product conveyed to the entire system, the powerful respirations indicate laborious effort, and the steam—the motive power, without which nothing—is the engine's spiritual part; sometimes this is high, sometimes low, sometimes intensely active, again at rest, but while never seen even through the glass gauges, its work is visible in every part, and when it is gone the locomotive is dead. Is not this a parallel worth thinking over?

When an engine pulls out of a yard with a line of cars containing human and other freight, it almost seems to realize its responsibility and power; the escaping steam and the clanging bell blend in a diapason which calls out as nearly as mechanism will permit—"I am off, don't be afraid." Its speed increases as it feels more and more the power of the steam in its iron joints, great volumes of escaping vapor and smoke stream to the rear and darken the sky; it is flying at last and will soon reach its destination if not beset by an accident. Here occurs another significant parallel: The faster it goes the greater the percentage of wear and loss by friction and jostle and the sooner the race will be made. It is an agent of modern travel and commerce and must obey the mandate imparted to its dumb consciousness to make haste hastily; this means not only the present trip but those to come, in which the pace must be still further heightened. It used to take two hours and more to go to Ogden, and for a while this was satisfactory, being placed in immediate contrast with journeying in vehicles over indifferent roads and taking the greater part of the day for it, camping out on the way; then, after adopting improved safeguards, the railroad managers yielded to the public pressure and dropped off twenty minutes; another year or so and twenty minutes more were clipped off the schedule, and now all or nearly all of the extra hour has disappeared, and the engine makes his course in one-half the time he did at first. If he could think, he would now be wondering when he was next to be called on to accelerate his pace and how much longer he will be able to endure it—would sometimes harbor a dread of the threatened collapse of himself and the danger to all in his wake when, with limbs battered, body racked, system strained and power curtailed, the last injection of power into the enfeebled mechanism has proved more than it could contain and live.

We are living very fast in this age, faster than we have any immediate comprehension of. The circumnavigation of the globe is no longer the event of a lifetime for which preparation is made months ahead of the time of starting; it is a pleasure trip which is sometimes determined upon one day and the journey begun the next. We are in instantaneous communication with three-fourths of the earth, including what was once considered a land beyond it—the flowery kingdom, the celestial empire of China. Crossing the Atlantic is no longer a voyage; it is a little visit involving days now as against months in the last generation, and but very few days at that, which are rapidly being diminished. The speed of horses has been increased ninety per cent beyond what our grandfathers believed possible, and altogether things are flying to the tune of a dizzy rate.

Let us pause and consider. The greater the speed the greater the proportion of danger, and, as already shown, the sooner our journey is ended. If we would make it pleasurable and enjoy what we see as we go along, it would be better to proceed more leisurely, to take things moderately and to not permit our minds or bodies to be on a constant, wearing strain. An engine constructed for ten thousand miles of travel with a train of so much heft to draw, at a rate of twenty miles an hour, will fall short of that amount of journeying if the speed be increased, and the ratio of falling off will be greater than that of the additional speed; so with us. We come into the earth designed and equipped for a pilgrimage of seventy, eighty or ninety years; whether all reach the allotted time or not depends largely upon ourselves. If we are afflicted with the demon of unrest and want to be in constant motion, we are thus taking off days and finally years from the other end; if we permit a disposition to embark in hazardous enterprises to control us, we are always confronted by the danger of immediate collapse; and if, through vicious habits, excessive indulgence in proper things or indulgence at all in forbidden things, we seek to add to the mere fleeting pleasures of the times, we simply defeat ourselves doubly—by curtailing the capacity for real enjoyment and hastening the day when enjoyment will not find us.

It is as well to think of these things now and then, and to act upon them at all times. Don't abuse the machinery; don't strain the motive power; don't give drafts upon your later life for the hollow and enervating pastimes of today. Be moderate in mental and physical exertion, expending only so much as is needed to accomplish your allotted tasks in life, and refrain from worrying and fretting because it is today and you would like to have it tomorrow. In plain and homely but nevertheless useful phrase, go slow!

THE ATLANTA Constitution, good Democrat though it is, thinks President Cleveland will do well not to call a special session, for the reason that the victorious party may not yet have abandoned its old habit of "doing something foolish."

GENIUS IN THE COLORED RACE.

The war in Dahomey is likely to result in the overthrow of the dusky monarch and the scattering of his dangerous but valiant Amazonian body guard. Behanzin is a graduate of a French Institute; he speaks that language as well as an Ethiopian can, and reads it with the greatest ease. His case is but another illustrative of the aptitude of the negro for mental cultivation and receiving impressions from external sources, there being now a great many such. Complimentary mention is now made of General Dodde, who is leading the forces against Behanzin. Our dispatches recently contained the information that he had been promoted to his present rank from a colonelcy for meritorious service and dashy exploits. He is, says the Springfield Republican, what we would call in the United States of America, a negro—that is, he is of mixed blood. One account asserts that he is a quadroon, another that he is a mulatto, but it is agreed that he is African on the maternal side. He is a graduate of the great French military school of St. Cyr, and saw service in the Franco-Prussian war. His distinction and promotion will not seem in any way peculiar to French military men, nor will they startle French public opinion. The French do not understand the intensity of Anglo-Saxon color prejudice. A man of talent is to Frenchmen a man of talent, never mind what is the color of his skin. "If he can serve the state let him serve it, and reap the rewards of his service" is the French view. Frenchmen do not mind in the least that the elder Dumas was as much of a negro as Frederick Douglass, and that his father, who was a distinguished officer, was more African than European, being the son of a Frenchman and a colored woman.

Formerly the display of either genius, education or enterprise by a negro was looked upon as something approaching the wonderful, and the possession of such rare gifts made the possessor famous throughout the land if not the world. A most conspicuous instance was Toussaint L'Ouverture, the Haytian patriot, and finally dictator, whose fame during the last generation dwarfed that of all contemporaries for a time; he was treacherously seized by Napoleon and conveyed to an Alpine fortress, where the rigors of the climate speedily ended his career. The Frenchman doubtless considered that one dictator at a time was quite enough.

NOT EXACTLY APPROPRIATE.

The New York World of the 13th has a picture representing Vice-President elect Stevenson grinding his headman's axe, the idea being thus conveyed that official heads will soon begin to fall. His record as a despatcher while assistant Postmaster General has rarely if ever been excelled; the minor postmasters throughout the country went in squads and droves at times; but we fail to see wherein that has anything to do with the case as it will be after the fourth of next March. It is generally understood that a Vice-President, considering that he is really a man of some consequence and great possibilities in an official way, is practically "on the shelf" till by some unforeseen mischance he is called to the head of the nation. Even as President of the Senate he is less spoken of than any member of that body; and there are no other offices over which he exercises control. Of course he can make himself a grand and imposing figure by reason of personal appearance, commanding figure and great and ready parliamentary ability, this having been the case with John C. Breckenridge more than any other man before or since; but even with that, he removes no one and appoints no one—so therefore the appropriateness of the labor over the grindstone.

WHAT IS MONEY?

"What is money?" is a question quite frequently appearing in the columns of newspapers; and suppose that those who read it here, without proceeding any further at present, try to frame a correct and comprehensive answer to it first and then pronounce it a foolish one. The dictionaries have good definitions in a general way; so they have of such words as "metaphysical," "metempsychosis," "psychological," and so on; but without exhaustive research and an analytical mind, how very few have even a slight comprehension of what such words are meant to stand for and convey upon reading the terse descriptions of them contained in the lexicons.

John Stuart Mill defines money as a "mere contrivance for facilitating exchanges," a definition followed by another British writer, Jevons. In his book, "Money and the Mechanism of Exchange," a contemporary gives the customary newspaper answer, that money is defined usually as a "measure of value;" it is something by the possession or surrender of which we measure the value to us of other articles. It need not be gold or silver. In Homer's time, oxen were money; the Abyssinians used salt; the natives of the west coast of Africa used sea-shells; the North American Indians used shells; the early settlers in Virginia used tobacco; Marco Polo says that the Chinese used paper—not paper redeemable in coin, but paper made valuable by the Great Khan's orders. So, really, money is anything that is generally accepted as of value, which serves to do away with trading "in kind" or barter; it makes no difference what its nature is, so long as it is something which is of value to the people at large.

It would thus appear that what mankind is disposed to recognize as money depends largely if not altogether upon our necessities, circumstances and surroundings. Being gregarious and communicative and diversified as to his habits, occupations and desires, man is by the force of such characteristics disposed to sell, purchase, barter and trade, and anything representative of values, if convenient to handle, if it acquires currency in a given place, becomes money so far as custom can establish anything. In order to prevent confusion and the clashing of interests, civilized people give to their respective governments the power of declaring what shall and what shall not be money, as well as regulate the amount thereof and its proportions. Our Constitution provides that nothing but gold and silver shall be legal tender in this country, and yet during the war we found it not only convenient but necessary to confer that function upon the government's promisee to pay. This was declared unconstitutional, whereupon the Supreme Court was rearranged with the special view of a decision the other way, which we got; and finally the greenbacks came to par without the assistance of the statute law, and very good and handy money it has always been.

Congress is prone to experimenting at times, and it does not always seem to have the best good of the people in view either. Having overridden the Constitution by making something money which was forbidden, it soon after proceeded to undo some of that material which was allowed; and in 1873 the infamous measure which struck down more than half of the country's circulating medium, making it simply so much merchandise whose value was to be regulated by gold, was enacted. There have been subsequent acts designed to curtail the evil inflicted to some extent, but none yet has proposed to do the proper thing of placing the two metals side by side at a fair and legal ratio, making either convertible into the other at the will of the holder and neither regulated as to value by that of the other.

It is claimed in places that we have not much to look forward to in this respect from the incoming administration; but perhaps it would be just as well to let that speak for itself. It can scarcely be said of Mr. Cleveland that he favors or will tolerate the circulation of dollars of any coinage that are not receivable for a hundred cents' worth of value; but let the ratio be once established and all silver coins correspond with that ratio, and we believe he will be found just as friendly to it as any of us are. In other words, his opposition to silver is not because it is silver, but because in his judgment silver coinage is treating the country very much as coal dealers do the people of Salt Lake, by giving short weight.

TO THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

The Chamber of Commerce of this city with one decisive movement upon the railways has accomplished more for the business interests of the Territory at large than perhaps anyone realizes. The roads have been forced to deal with their patrons on terms approaching equity; from schedules of freightage which in each and almost every case represented a large proportion of the value of the goods imported and exported, they have come down to reasonable profits and the people themselves are the gainers, because they, in the end, had to pay it all.

Having accomplished so much, and thus shown its capability in the right direction when once it takes hold of a thing in earnest, why not proceed in that direction so long as there is a call for its labors? We of Salt Lake are still groaning under an excessive rate of freight for an article produced at home, but which by its nature cannot be transported profitably otherwise than by rail; we refer to the duty on coal which the railroad companies exact from unwilling hands in this city. The rates are more grievous than any with which the Chamber has yet dealt, and are out of all proportion with any other line of business in which such companies are engaged. There is no legitimacy in the profits realized, any more than in any other form of enforced tribute. The roads have us at their mercy, and for years we have been confronted with a realization of what such corporations will do when they get the upper hand. Now let the Chamber of Commerce make its power for good felt once more, by forcing or at least causing our transportation lines to accept of reasonable compensation for services rendered, or inaurate a move for a competitive line. If a more feasible plan does not present itself, why not call a public meeting for the purpose of taking the initiative steps in the matter? Such a gathering, if called under the auspices of such a body, would mean business from the word go and would acquire impetus and power as it went along. We hope the Chamber will act upon this suggestion; if it can again lead us out of the wilderness, all hands herewith, as in duty bound, will sound its praises far and wide, besides which, the individuals composing it will share with the rest of us the benefits resulting from such action. This latter consideration is no small matter, as they of course already know.

WILLIAM'S WILL.

The young kaiser of Germany will, it is said, make his pet measure—the military bill—a personal matter. The representatives of South Germany in the Reichstag are understood to be almost solidly opposed to it, and as there will be unquestionably others who are likewise against the project, the emperor can easily foresee a crisis unless heroic measures are adopted. To this end he will appear in the parliament in person and lend a helping hand to get the objectionable bill through. It proposes, among other things, to reduce the term of compulsory military service from three years to two, but there must be something more of which we over here are not fully advised, since there would seem to be no reasonable objection to the period of enforced military service being made less. William is a very self-contained sort of person, always strong-headed and it may be at times wrong-headed; he has set his heart on having the military bill become law, and the chances largely favor the proposition that it will.

By the by, what has become of that Russian scare on the frontier? Its collapse along with the emperor's determination to reform the national armament, makes things Tautonic wear a sinister aspect.

THE BEET SUGAR INDUSTRY.

The beet sugar industry has as many patrons in Utah, proportioned to population, as any other part of the country, and it is growing wherever the beets can be raised. But it does not sound businesslike to hear of any of them proposing to shut down because of the election of Cleveland, as is the case with a large enterprise of the kind in California. A special to the San Francisco Chronicle from Los Angeles says that general regret is felt among the people there, comprising members of all political parties, at the probable collapse of the Anaheim co-operative beet sugar enterprise. A year ago, encouraged by the success of the factory at Chino, an effort was made to establish a beet sugar factory in the Cahuenga valley, near Los Angeles, on the co-operative plan, under which each acre represents a share of stock in the factory and partakes in the profits of the concern. Several thousand acres of land were pledged in the Cahuenga valley, but it was not quiet sufficient, and the people who had been active there went to Orange county where, during the past nine months, a number of enthusiastic meetings have been held and sufficient land pledged to insure success. Everything was ready to start the enterprise going, and the representatives of Eastern capital in San Francisco had agreed to furnish $500,000 with which to erect a factory when the news was received that, owing to the result of the election and the anticipated removal of the 2-cent bounty, the capitalists had backed out. It will scarcely be possible to obtain the necessary means elsewhere under the circumstances, and thus one of the most promising enterprises on the Pacific coast, the pioneer of its kind in America, and one which would undoubtedly have been followed by scores of others in California, each netting about $150 an acre annually on several thousand acres of land and employing several hundreds of people, is "snipped in the bud as one of the fruits of the triumph of the Democracy."

SANPETE STAKE CONFERENCE.

The conference of the Sanpete Stake was held in Moroni on the 12th and 13th of November, 1892.

There were present President B. H. Roberts, of the presidency of the Seventies; President Peterson and counselors Henry Beal and John B. Maiben, of the Stake presidency; members of the High Council, the Bishops of the wards and also a good attendance of the Saints. The usual conference business was attended to, the general and Stake authorities being sustained by unanimous vote of the conference.

President Peterson called the attention of the Saints to the effort required of them in assisting in the completion of the Salt Lake Temple, that he and his counselors had visited most of the wards in the Stake and gave notice that they would visit the remainder on the 14th and 15th days of the present month, to assist them in making arrangements whereby they may be enabled to meet the requirement.

The following named Bishops made reports of their several wards: J. W. Irens of Moroni; John E. Reese, of Wales; C. N. Lund, of Mount Pleasant; C. C. N. Davis, of Ephraim South; W. T. Reid, of Mant North; L. B. Anderson, of Ephraim North ward. Statistical and Sunday school reports were read.

The speakers during the conference were President Peterson, Counselors Henry Beal and John B. Maiben, Elders Peter Christensen of Moroni, Ole Sorenson and E. A. Christensen of Fountain Green, returned missionaries (Elders) Christensen from Norway and Elder Sorenson from the Northwestern States, each gave an interesting account of his labors and experience; Elder C. H. Wheelock, President B. H. Roberts and Elder J. F. Allred also addressed the conference. From the reports made the several quorums and society organizations are in working order, no changes being noted anywhere in the Stake.

The presidency expressed themselves at the close of the conference as being pleased with the attendance of the Saints, the instructions given and the good spirit enjoyed by both speakers and hearers. President Peterson remarked that the Saints had voted unanimously to sustain the Priesthood; he moved that the Priesthood sustain the Saints in instructing them and watching over and counseling them to the best of their ability; which motion was sustained by the large body of Priesthood present.

Conference adjourned for three months to meet in Ephraim on Saturday, the 13th of February, 1893.

GEORGE TAYLOR, Clerk.

FOR MEXICAN COLONISTS.

COLONIA JUAREZ, Chihuahua, Mexico, Nov. 8, 1892.—Heretofore most of our colonists have come into this republic via Deming, New Mexico, and have had to pay charges for certificates, consular papers, and also extortionate charges for papers of dispatch in passing goods and effects through the custom house.

Our colonists coming to these upper colonies can now do much better to come to El Paso, Texas, especially those coming by rail, and bringing teams or other effects, as they can arrange with the Santa Fe railroad to pass on to San Jose, or Oje Caliente stations on the Mexican Central where previous arrangements should be made for friends to meet them, saving about sixty miles' wagon travel.

Arrangements have been made with the responsible and well known firm of Ketselen & Degetau, for the making of papers of dispatch to pass at the custom house in Ciudad Juarez; and where they have a large store of merchandise for this market. They also have a store and offices at the foot of El Paso street in El Paso, near the Santa Fe Railroad station, where they keep on hand wagons, harness, agricultural tools and any other articles colonists may wish to purchase, and cheaper than they can be got further west.

The Mexican consul now at El Paso is Senor Jose Zayas Guarneros, No. 612 San Antonio street. He will sign consular papers on free lists of colonists and give them certificate free of charge; but they must have our certificate that they are colonists and stating their destination, number of family, etc. He also requires a certificate of good moral character, signed by a state or county officer, in the locality where the colonist comes from. When a colonist brings goods on which duty has to be paid, separate papers have to be made out and on such the usual fee is charged.

Colonists, on arrival at El Paso, should call at the office of Ketselen & Degetau and make known their wishes to Mr. Webster, the superintendent, who will advise them for their safety and welfare; also weigh and list their goods and make out all the necessary documents for their dispatch at the custom house, and so relieve the colonist of much care and anxiety, the charges being as low as the work can be done for. I send you a list of articles free to colonists.

Colonists coming here for the first time and desiring to unite with any ward should bring a recommendation from the ward where they last resided to be handed to the Bishop where they choose to locate.

Those who may prefer coming in on the Deming route, and any desiring to locate at Colonia Diaz, will find Milton S. Ray at Deming prepared to make out papers and assist colonists, who may employ him or choose such other help as they deem best.

General good health now prevails among the people. Recently we have had excellent rains and hope for more, as needful for the support of cattle on the range, many having died for lack of feed during the long dry spell we have had. The season so far is mild, little frost, the leaves hang on the cottonwood trees, yellow tinged; the peach and other fruit trees hold their foliage yet.

The result of our Indian trouble is a preparation by drilling and target practice once a month—also securing a supply of arms and ammunition. We recently had a visit from Ex-Governor Don Luis Farrasene. He offers to aid us in having a fort and soldiers posted for our protection in the mountains. Heretofore we have been providentially preserved, and now, as in our past experience in Utah, the counsel is good to be armed and ready, if we never need to use them, for we are then insured, as "obedience is better than sacrifice."

Brother Thompson's boy, who was shot by Apaches at Cliff Ranch, has recovered, and is here with us, also his sister; Dr. K. G. Maaser is expected here tomorrow. Elder H. Eyring is teaching a class in Spanish, and our free school by Prof. D. E. Harris is quite prosperous. Respectfully,

A. F. MACDONALD.

Following is the list above referred to, with other matters of interest in the franchise granted to the Mormon colonists by the Mexican government. The statement is furnished Brother Macdonald by Messrs. Ketselen & Degetau:

Art. 2. All colonists coming to the republic of Mexico have the privilege of importing free of duties all common furniture, used or new, and household goods which they bring with themselves and which they need for settling up housekeeping.

Art. 3. The secretary of colonization will determine which colonists are to have the privilege of importing free of duties provisions with the restrictions and for the time he deems convenient, according to article 4 of the above mentioned ordinance.

Art. 4. The importation of all goods which, according to this decree or according to the tariff now in force, are exempt from duties can be made by the colonists whose character as such are already recognized, either by themselves or by any agent they may select, but subject to the following dispositions:

Art. 5. The colonists, either personally or through their agents, have to apply to the agent of the secretary of colonization, asking for the importation of those goods which they need and which, according to this decree or as per the tariff now in force, are free of duties; they must make the petition in duplicate, stating clearly what goods they intend bringing and the kind of same. This petition will be examined by the agent of the secretary of colonization and, upon being found correct, will be certified to by him. One copy of the petition will be sent to the collector of customs at the port where the importation will be made, and another will be kept by himself, and a third copy will be sent to the secretary of colonization; and for his own protection, the petitioner will get a certificate from said agent of the secretary of colonization. In those places where there is no agent of the secretary of colonization, the secretary of colonization will deputize as such any federal employee.

Art. 6. All importations made by the colonists, either by themselves personally or by their agents, have to be made in a consular invoice in which there can be included only those articles which are free of duty, which articles must belong to the colonist.

Art. 7. The importation having been made, the inspection will take place according to the regulations of the tariff, and if everything is found correct by the collector of customs, the goods will be released; but if any discrepancy or difference is found, the collector of customs will proceed according to Art. 388 of the ordinance now in force.

Art. 8. The agents of the secretary of colonization will take care that the agents of colonization companies notify them in time of the number of colonists they are expecting and the ports through which they intend entering Mexico, so they may have ample time to notify the collector of customs and avoid thereby inconveniences and trouble. In this notice which the representative of the secretary of colonization sends to the collector of customs, the names of the colonists have to appear.

Art. 9. If there are agents of the secretary of colonization at the port of entry of the colonists, they must be present when the furniture and household goods of the colonists are inspected at the custom house, in order to make the classification of the goods free of duties according to article 2; and in default of any agent, the collector of customs will act as such. Should the goods be superior in kind and quality to what is prescribed in article 3, the collector of customs will proceed as per article 180 of the tariff.

Art. 10. The agents of the secretary of colonization will take care by their own strict responsibility that no permit be given the colonists for more goods than those which they really need.

For this purpose, they will have to keep an account of all amounts granted and another one for those they may need, as well as for building material, provisions, implements for farming, etc.

Art. 11. Should it be the case that any colonist or his agent abuses this franchise by selling or trading with goods imported free of duties, the agent of the secretary of colonization will notify the district judge immediately and this judge will investigate the matter; and in the event of fault being proven, the guilty party will be punished according to article 371 of the tariff. The collectors of customs, in such cases, have the same duty.

Art. 12. The agents of the secretary of colonization have to keep a register in which they will enter the progressive number of the petitions, date of same, date when a copy of same was sent to the customs house at the port of entry, name of this customs house, number of packages of the petitions, contents of the packages, name or names of the colonists, name of the agent. Every six months, the agent will report to the secretary of colonization.

Art. 13. Said agents will also keep an itemized register of all amounts of goods granted each colonist, stating the number of members of his family, if any, figuring up every six months the amounts they have received in provisions, as well as building material, farming implements, etc. A copy of this register will be sent to the secretary of colonization every six months, adding any information they deem convenient, so that the secretary may be guided accordingly and work in future with better effect.

MEXICO, July 17, 1889.

Extract of Customs Regulations in Force at Time of Issuing Above Decree.

Art. 388. The contravention consisting in the defraudation of the duties will be punished with a fine of double the amount of duties on the goods imported, this fine to be figured on that part of the goods which is found to be in excess of that appearing in the documents, when the discrepancy is in the quantity; when the goods are found to be of another kind and subject to higher duties than those mentioned in the documents, double duties will be collected on all such goods.

Art. 180; frac. 6. When the collector of customs notices that, among the goods being imported, there are some which cannot be included in this franchise, he will proceed to make out a consular invoice and to collect the corresponding duties, being authorized to make a discount should those goods be used.

Art. 871. Smuggling is that crime committed by importing or exporting goods subject to the payment of duties, without paying such duties or without the knowledge or consent of the revenue officers, whether the importation be made clandestinely or by force.

DEATH OF SUSAN S. YOUNG.

Sister Susan Snively Young, relict of the late President Brigham Young died at her residence—The Lion House, Salt Lake City—at 1:30 p. m., November 20th, 1892.

Deceased was the daughter of Henry and Mary Snively, and was born in Shenandoah county, Virginia, October 30th, 1815. She was consequently in her 78th year at the time of her death. The family moved from Virginia to Bedford county, Penn., where they resided when the Elders of the Church first visited that state. The Snivelys received the Gospel under the ministrations of Erastus Snow, who was then in his youth. Soon after embracing the Gospel they left Pennsylvania for Missouri, where they expected to join the main body of the Saints. The latter were, however, driven out of Missouri about that time and soon after established the city of Nauvoo. The Snively family located for some time at Springfield, Illinois, and subsequently removed to Nauvoo, at which place, in the year 1844, the deceased was married to President Young. She, in common with her co-religionists, suffered the hardships incidental to the expulsion from Nauvoo. She remained at Winter Quarters until 1848, when she crossed the plains and entered Salt Lake valley.

Sister Young, or as familiarly called by her acquaintances, Aunt Susan, was one of the most amiable of her sex, and was an ideal Latter-day Saint. We do not believe that she ever wilfully neglected the performance of a duty pertaining to her religion, which was always dearer to her than life. One of her leading characteristics was gratitude for all benefits bestowed on her, while the gentleness of her disposition was phenomenal. The physician who attended her in her last illness remarked recently that she was one of the "sweetest creatures" he ever waited upon in the course of his professional career. While amiability was one of her conspicuous traits, she was also remarkable for force and independence of character, which were exhibited throughout her life to its latest moment. She contemplated the approach of death with the utmost composure, and stated not long since that she would soon depart. "I am going to see the folks and I have lots to tell them." Last Friday she suddenly held out her hands, while her face was illuminated with a heavenly smile as if she were in an ecstasy of joy; then she changed and wept, conveying the impression that the veil of eternity had been lifted to give her a momentary glimpse of her future glorious home and then closed down again.

The end of this good woman was peace. She has gone to join her husband and other loved ones in the Paradise of God, there to await the sounding of the trumpet of the first resurrection, when the noble spirit will be re-united with the immortalized body and her redemption be made complete.

OGDEN ITEMS.

[Ogden Standard.]

A special twelve-car train of silk was yesterday transferred by the Central Pacific to the Union Pacific for eastern points.

The condition of the twelve-year-old son of Warren Elmer who was severely injured on Saturday night by being kicked by a horse, was much improved yesterday and the attending physicians now have hopes of his recovery.

Delaney R. Brandon, journalist and printer, who has been rusticated in Wyoming and Eastern Oregon during the summer, is at the Union Pacific hospital, the result of a fracture of the leg which he sustained at Montpelier on the 4th inst.

The jury in the damage suit of P. H. Alired et al. vs. Salt Lake City left yesterday morning on the Rio Grand Western passenger train to look over the ground involved in the case, which is near Utah lake on the east and west sides of the Jordan river. The arguments in the case will be made this morning and the judge will charge the jury.

David A. Jenkins yesterday filed a complaint against D. D. Smith and R. B. Spencer, the cowboys captured by Sheriff Belnap last week, charging them with stealing a saddle valued at $50, found in the tent near the old gas well. The men are now confined in the county jail, serving out a thirty days' sentence for petit larceny. As soon as they are released their arrest will follow.

Judging from the manner in which things are shaping themselves Ogden will get the Southern Pacific shops and all their adjuncts. The required bonus will be raised and the contract signed. It has been accurately figured out that with the pay rolls of the shops added to those already paid in Ogden by the Southern Pacific, the amount of the monthly roll will reach the extremely respectable figure of $100,000. The Southern Pacific officials have declared that they intend, as far as possible, to give the work and contracts to Ogden people. Ogden contractors will be allowed to put in their bids for the construction of the buildings of the plant.

The case of the Lima Machine Works vs. E. H. Parsons et al. was called for trial in Judge Miner's court and a jury empaneled. After hearing the opening statement and allowing some papers to be filed in evidence Judge Miner continued the case until this afternoon. This action grew out of the street railway war two years ago when the Ogden City Street Railway company and the Henderson-Brinker Electric Street Railway company were endeavoring to construct and operate tracks over the same roadbed. A new steam motor purchased by the Lima Machine Works, with the understanding that until fully paid for it should remain the property of the latter, was attached and sold under execution by the United States marshal. The Lima people now want $3,000 damages, the alleged price of the engine.

The board of directors of the territorial reform school met yesterday afternoon. Walter Greenwell was released on parole, having demonstrated to the satisfaction of the board and superintendent that he desired to lead a better life and become a good and useful man. Some time ago William Grieves, of Salt Lake, was paroled by the executive committee upon recommendation of Mr. Woolley, and the action was approved by the board. Young Grieves was released in order that he might accompany his mother to Denver, where she had removed for good. For the second time Henry Lightfoot petitioned for the release of his daughter, Lilly, who was ordered confined there by Judge Miner for immoral conduct. This time he was accompanied by an attorney. The matter was finally referred to Messrs. Moyle, Woolley and Stephens. Considerable routine business was transacted.

A large number of business men met at the city hall last night to perfect the organization of the board of trade, which is proposed to substitute for the nearly defunct Chamber of Commerce. The committee appointed at the last meeting to prepare a constitution and by-laws presented its report, which was laid over until the next meeting. Much interest was expressed in the proposed removal of the Southern Pacific shops in Ogden, and it seemed to be the general wish that the city council should aid in every way possible in securing the change. The question of membership fee was discussed and a fee of $10 was suggested, but no action was taken. The committee on membership announced that it intended to make a thorough canvass of the city and to give every business man and property owner a chance to join. The meeting adjourned to meet again on Tuesday evening, Nov. 29th.

At the city council meeting last evening the committee on streets recommended that the petition of Richard Wilson and others for the grading of Twenty-fourth street beyond the Weber river bridge be granted as soon as the work can be conveniently done. The same committee recommended that the profiles prepared by the city engineer for the establishment of a regular grade on Washington avenue north to the city limits, and on Twentieth street between Washington and Adams avenues, be approved. The ordinance levying a special tax on the property within sewer district No. 7 for the purpose of raising money with which to defray the expenses now being incurred in the construction of the sewers in the district was returned from the committee, slightly amended, read the third time and referred back to the committee on laws to make an amendment regarding the mode of assessment. The ordinance providing for additional punishment for cruelty to animals was read the third time and passed. The contract between the city and the Ogden Gas, Light & Fuel company, for the electric street lighting for the next three years, was approved.

Yesterday gas was struck on the ground leased by the Ohio & Utah Natural Gas company in Wilson ward at a depth of sixty-five feet, while driving an inch and a half well for water. A light seepage was noticed on Saturday night, but the sand and gravel evidently clogged up the bottom of the pipe, as the gas ceased to flow. Yesterday morning, Messrs. Stephens and Main superintended the clearing out of the pipe and suddenly with a mighty rumble and roar the escaping gas rushed up throwing mud, gravel and water twenty feet into the air. The noise could be heard for a long distance. After the pipe had become comparatively free of sand, water and stones a match was applied and a flame between six and ten feet high of intense heat was the result. The light blazed fiercely for several minutes, but suddenly another discharge of mud and water extinguished it and the experiment had to be repeated. The flame is still burning and may be seen for several miles across the country. The gas is odorless and colorless and Mr. Stephens, who has had many years of experience in the gas and oil regions and is considered an expert on such questions, declares that it is pure petroleum gas and is probably a leakage through some fissure in the rock and in order to strike the main body of the pipe in the main well yet to be driven will have to penetrate from 600 to 800 feet. The company will be prepared upon the arrival of its machinery from Findlay, Ohio, to sink to almost any depth desired. Before the new year has far advanced it looks as if Ogden's streets will be lighted with natural gas. The gas from the new well will be controlled with shut-offs and utilized in the boiler, which will furnish steam with which to operate the machinery in putting down the large wells. The derricks will be erected at once and immediately upon the arrival of the machinery from the east active work will be begun.

SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

The attendance at the Sunday School Union meeting held last evening (Nov. 21) in the Fourteenth ward assembly hall, was unusually large. All the city wards, except the Fifth, Ninth and Twenty-third, were numerously represented, and also the schools of Union, Big Cottonwood South District and Sugar House.

Stake Superintendent T. C. Griggs presided.

The excellent singing exercises were given by the Thirteenth ward Sunday school choir.

THE LECTURE.

Elder Horace Cummings delivered an instructive and entertaining lecture upon the subject of "Attention, How to Secure it and How to Retain it when Obtained," prefacing his remarks by a definition of the subject. Attention was of two kinds, that which is obtained by compulsion and that obtained or given willingly by the student. The successful teacher must obtain the willing attention of the children, and in leading their minds from the known to the unknown. Comparisons must be made with familiar objects. For instance, to tell a child what a lion is, show it a cat, and explain its character and by explaining that the lion is merely a very large cat, the child has a very good conception of the subject.

To present the lesson to the children in an indirect way, leaving them something to discover themselves, is another way of obtaining closer attention.

The love of approbation, possessed by nearly all children may be gratified by a wise teacher to very good advantage in getting the attention of the members of the class. Then there are others of the class who like to be looked up to by the rest of the class, who, when they have become interested, aid the teacher in interesting the others.

A most excellent plan to obtain attention is to intersperse the lesson with an interesting story, anecdote or practical illustration.

As a reward for early attendance, promise a good story to all who will be on time the following Sunday, and the children will not only be early, but will be most sure to come every Sunday. The teacher who can keep something ahead of his class, something for the children to look forward to with eager anticipation, can always interest his class.

A teacher who obtains the love, respect and esteem of his children can much more easily obtain and retain their attention, and teachers should seek to ingratiate themselves into the affections of their class.

ELDER S. A. WILSON

of the Nineteenth ward school, in an interesting address, explained the method of teaching adopted in the Nineteenth ward Sabbath school, where a yearly programme is arranged in accordance with the instructions given in the Sunday School Guide, and which, if generally adopted, would very materially increase the efficiency of the work done in the schools, and make them more interesting and attractive to the children.

commended to the earnest consideration of all Sunday school workers the plan adopted in the Nineteenth ward, and suggested that the plan be studied by the superintendents and teachers in all the schools of this State. The lessons are planned and laid out for the whole year, for the four departments of the graded Sunday schools, and present such a variety of subjects and lessons, adopted to each department, as will furnish interesting matter that is sure to make the Sunday school a very attractive institution.

A few remarks were made by Elders Joseph Height and Hiram Pickett, of Cassia Stake, and Elder Larkin, of this city, special Sunday school missionaries in this State.

Teachers and superintendents of this state were specially requested to obtain a set of the Graded Lesson cards, already referred to, acquaint themselves with their contents, and present them to their schools, and be prepared to adopt them in all the schools of this state the coming year. The cards can be obtained at the Juvenile Instructor office.

The choir sang "Let us oft speak kind words to each other," and Elder John Alford pronounced the benediction.

The Fourteenth Ward school will furnish the musical exercises at the next meeting, and a practical illustration of graded school work will be given by one of the departments of the Nineteenth Ward school, to show the method of using the programme cards as now adopted in that school.

RETURNED ELDERS.

Elder John Pearson of Huntington, Emery county, called at the News office this morning having just returned from a mission to the Southern states, for which part of the world he left his home on November 1, 1890. Elder Pearson labored in Alabama and in western Florida during his absence from this Territory. He made many friends, enjoyed the best of health and returns in good spirits. He will leave for his home on an evening train.

Elders George A. Whitehead, of Springfield; James C. Lambert, of this city; Daniel Moss, of South Bountiful, and Alfred W. Peterson, of this city, called at the News office this afternoon, all having recently returned from the missionary field.

Elder Whitehead left his home on November 4, 1890, and has labored in West Virginia of the Southern States mission. He returned November 19, 1892. Elder Lambert left for his mission Nov. 7th, 1890, and has been laboring in north Alabama and Mississippi. He arrived in this city on Nov. 19th, 1892. Elder Moss left Nov. 4, 1890, and spent the first nine months in north Alabama. He was then appointed to labor in Mississippi until released to return home. He arrived in Salt Lake City November 20, 1892. Elder Alfred W. Peterson left September 8, 1890, and has been laboring the whole time in south Alabama conference. He arrived in this city November 19, 1892.

The Elders report that they have enjoyed excellent health during their absence and that the mission is in a prosperous condition in the various states they have visited.

Elder Hugh J. Cannon, whose return on November 12th from a mission to Germany has already been briefly mentioned in these columns, states that that mission is in quite a prosperous condition. New fields are constantly being opened up and many opportunities are found of bearing a testimony of the truth. The religious liberty of the German empire is not all that could be desired. The distribution of tracts and the holding of public meetings are generally looked upon with suspicion on the part of the authorities, but conversations in private can be held everywhere and are effective of much good. Elder Cannon left for his field of labor on April 11, 1891 and spent the first eleven months in Leipzig, Saxony. He was then called to Kiel and Hamburg where he labored until called upon to perform the duty of conveying the remains of his beloved brother to Salt Lake City. Elder Cannon was in Hamburg during the awful ravages of the cholera.

He states that up to the date of his departure, official figures gave the total of deaths as 10,000 of a population of 600,000; but it is thought that the official figures fall very much below the real number of victims of that dread scourge. It was probably the most severe visitation suffered by that city in later centuries. Whole families are dead in many homes. Dr. Koeb, the eminent physician, has expressed the fear that the epidemic is likely to return with renewed force in the spring.

Elder Cannon says he has enjoyed good health during his absence and felt much blessed in his labors.

A CHICAGO man who was being held up and robbed by a footpad, yelled so lustily that a policeman ran up and the marauder ran away; whereupon the bluecoat, keenly sensible of his duty to make an arrest at all hazards, dragged the highwayman's victim off to the stationhouse for disturbing the peace.

Our highly esteemed cotemporary the evening News, of Salt Lake, yesterday celebrated its silver wedding with the daily press. Its present editor, twenty-five years ago, was one of its honorary paper carriers, and his route, which comprised the entire western part of the city, required the delivery of sixteen papers. Among his reminiscences he forgets to note that when the task had lost some of its delightful novelty, he found two ready fags in the neighborhood of his home.—Ogden Standard.

The "two ready fags" must be the two affectionate younger brothers who were proud, in consideration of an occasional "ride around the block," to groom the afore-said carrier's pony.

A THANKSGIVING STORY.

It seemed to Alice that she had only been asleep a minute, but when she opened her eyes it was broad daylight. "I suppose I must jump right up as this is Thanksgiving day and I give my party this afternoon."

"Most certainly," replied a strange voice; "but don't forget the baskets."

"What baskets?" she asked; and then Alice saw a queer-looking little old man set an immense basket on the table, and before she could count he had whisked out of the room.

"She sprang out of bed and ran to peep into the basket, thinking some one had sent her a nice Thanksgiving remembrance."

"Oh, how provoking! Only one little empty basket inside a big empty basket. That's just my luck," she murmured; "I'm always disappointed! What a horrid, mean trick that was to play on me. I believe that little old man was a mischievous boy with a false-face on. I suppose now he is chuckling to himself and saying: 'He, he! How I fooled her!' If it was Cousin Dick I'll pay him back."

Alice lifted up the little basket. Under it was a letter. Opening it, she read these lines:

MY DEAR LITTLE FRIEND—I send you two baskets. One is for your thanks, the other for your petitions. After they are filled, return to the King.

MESSENGER TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS.

"That is lovely!" she cried, clapping her hands. "I have wanted so much to visit a real King. I never knew there was one living here."

"Of course I shall receive some handsome gifts, for kings always give little girls beautiful presents; at least they do in fairy stories, which tell all about castles, kings and princes."

After carefully dressing herself she sat down at her writing desk to think of the things she wanted and of what she had to be thankful for.

"The big basket of coarse was meant for the things I want, and as I have had nothing but disappointments and bad luck all year, the tiny basket will just do for my thanks."

"I don't believe I have any blessings. I am sure it will be hard for me to scrape up a whole thank. I hope I spell the words right, and I'll try to write a stylish hand." But being only to years old there were many words that she did not know how to spell and her writing looked far from stylish.

In the little basket she put the cards, on which she wrote: "Thanks for the beautiful Bisk doll, but she had awful old-fashioned close. Thanks for the French nut-cracker, but two of his teeth were broken. My toy dog's tail did not suit me at all. My china set of dishes were nice, but one saucer had a crack in it."

Then she went to work and wrote the things she wanted on separate cards, and soon the large basket was heaping full.

She wanted a little World's Fair, a toy elevator for her dolls; a work box, some rings, a pair of bracelets, new dresses; she wanted a lemonade fountain that would spout all the time; she wanted it to snow ice cream; she wanted a whole confectionery town and a private candy manufactory and many other things.

This task done, she put on her new mink fur, tied her ostrich-tipped hat under her chin and started on her journey. As it was to be a real adventure, she said nothing to her mamma or papa. She thought on her return she would tell them all about it.

Others were going up to the King's palace with petitions and thanks, so Alice had no trouble finding the way. At last she, with many others, stood with their baskets before the King.

"Now I am ready for your thanks," he said. "Will each one hold up the basket containing his thanks. Nearly everybody held up the little basket. In a few were dwarfed, dried-up thanks, or parts of thanks, while many were empty. Alice noticed that the little cripple girl whose mother went out washing had her large basket filled with thanks."

She had thanks for her home, her mother, a made-over dress; thanks for a flower, thanks for the sunshine, thanks for a bird that came to her window every morning to sing to her, thanks for Johnny Jones giving her a ride on his sled, thanks for a hat and dress Alice had sent her; in fact, Alice couldn't begin to count the things this little girl had to be thankful for. This basket seemed to please the King, and he ordered it to be filled with the choicest of gifts.

The farmer, too, had a big basket of thanks, but the rest of the large baskets were filled with petitions. The king then ordered them all to be emptied, and they made almost a mountain. He commanded a match to be struck and thrown among them. In a few moments there was a great bonfire. The blaze leaped up so high that Alice gave a scream. Imagine her surprise when she found it was only a dream. But that day when a little girl went to church she took a very grateful little heart. When she began to think of her blessings she had so many she could not count them.

Among the guests at her Thanksgiving dinner in the afternoon was the young cripple child, the little newsboy who brought her papa the daily papers, and Mary Ann Smith, the shoemaker's daughter, who lived in the cellar below the grocery store.

Alice gave her one of her own pretty dresses with a real silk sash. I would like to tell you more about the dinner, and what good things were prepared for the children; of the turkey, the fruit cake, nuts, candy and ice cream; and how the children played delightful games. But I have only time to send each of you a couple of baskets; one is small and the other is large. In which will you put your thanks?

COAL RESOURCES OF UTAH.

While our Territory is blessed with the scenery of Eden, the climate is such as to make coal a matter of general interest, which fact must be my apology for this essay. Coal is the most extensive of our minerals. From the Uintah reservation on the north, it spreads in massive strata south, a distance of three hundred and fifty miles to the Colorado, in a varying belt from five to twenty miles wide. The largest veins are those between Sanpete and Emery counties.

During a day's drive down Huntington canyon, the traveler's attention is constantly called to the coal beds peeping from beneath their caprocks. For a long distance the Huntington river flows over a bed of the black mineral. The longest veins developed are those at Scofield and Winter Quarters. They vary from fourteen to sixteen feet in thickness, dipping to the south and west. During the year 1890, three hundred and fifty thousand tons of the best bituminous coal were taken out in these camps.

The quality of Castle Gate coal is unsurpassed in the world. There have been a hundred coke ovens built, which produced ten thousand tons of superior coke during the year 1890.

There are several mines and prospects near Coalville, on the Weber, the most important being owned by the Home Coal Company, and Chalk Creek Company, which furnish the northern settlements with about thirty-six thousand four hundred tons yearly.

About fifteen miles east of Fairview lie the great fields of the Huntington. There are but two mines opened, one owned by citizens and the other by an English company. The latter had several coke ovens built about fifteen years ago, and found the coal to produce good coke. They ceased work, however, on account of the long distance to a railroad.

If the Rio Grande Western would build a branch line up Cottonwood canyon, scores of mines would be opened, and coal enough produced to supply a nation for centuries to come.

Wales, in the western part of Sanpete, has had in operation mines, which have supplied Sanpete and Juab counties for years. The yield now is comparatively small, and the quality not so good as other mines.

The fields of Southern Utah are twenty miles in width, and terminate at the Colorado river. An analytical test shows coal to contain over fifty per cent pure carbon, and one half of one per cent sulphur, showing an excellent quality for smelting and blacksmithing.

Thus we see how nature has blessed Utah, and when the citizens fully realize the resources of our fair Territory, and make an effort to develop them, they will grow in riches untold.

JOSEPH HANSEN, Fairview.

AMAZONS IN WAR.

"The most warlike and powerful of the African states will be a thing of the past before the end of another month." This is what Col. Dodds wrote to the home government when reporting the progress he had made in the campaign against Behanzin, king of Dahomey. The entire civilized world will hail with delight the downfall of this blood-thirsty savage, whose entire reign has been marked by the most unheard of cruelties, both toward his own subjects and the neighboring tribes.

This war has been brought about by violation of pledges on the part of Behanzin. At the close of the war of 1899 France made a treaty with the king, by which, in consideration of an annual pension of 20,000 francs, he recognized France's rights along the coast and agreed to stop his raids into the French protectorate of Porto Novo, long the favorite hunting-ground of Dahomeyan rulers for slaves and victims to sacrifice in their horrible fetish rites.

Late last fall the king violated his agreement by sending expeditions into Porto Novo, where they surprised several unsuspecting towns and dragged hundreds of people to Abomey. When the lieutenant-governor of the French colony protested the king sent an insolent letter declaring that he recognized no treaty, that he had a right in Porto Novo because his fathers for ages had been the suzerains of that country and that he should continue his forays if he chose, because all the region occupied by the French belonged to him: and yet, as he knew very well, his father Geleve fourteen years ago gave up to France all rights to the port of Kotonu, and he himself had recognized the claims of France in Porto Novo. The young bully sent word to the French that if they touched one of his towns in the interior he would at once destroy Porto Novo and all the French posts. He was carried away with the idea of his power and the prowess of his fair-famed amazons, and undoubtedly believed that he could drive the French into the sea.

King Behanzin is a most extraordinary mixture of civilization and barbarity. The dominant note in his character is unlimited vanity. His younger years were spent in Paris, where he learned to read French. He subscribes regularly for several Parisian newspapers which are brought from the coast by special messengers. When he first saw a notice of himself and his capital in the Figaro he exhibited almost childish delight and danced around the paper containing the news, after which he caused his amazonian guard to be brought up and translated this information to them, at the same time giving orders for the preparation of another raid on the French settlement to show his contempt and fearlessness of the consequences.

In ordinary times the army of Dahomey is composed of 3,000 amazons and 6,000 to 7,000 men warriors. This is the well-drilled standing army, which is kept near the capital ready to take up arms at a moment's notice. In the present emergency the king has been compelled to call out all the available reserves, which gives him some twenty thousand amazons and men, all told. As the population of Dahomey is estimated at more than 200,000, any or all of which can be turned into soldiery by the king, it can be readily understood that the French will not have such a small affair on their hands as most persons imagine.

The most unique features of Dahomey are its large force of women warriors and its terrible system of religious sacrifices, in which hundreds of human victims are butchered at the capital every year. The sacrificial festivities take place in the autumn and spring and are called "customs." Last May the French report that not less than six hundred people were butchered in the market square at Abomey. A large shed called the "blood house" was erected, in which the prisoners are confined and exhibited prior to the butchery. They are bound to poles driven in the ground, and black and white goats are tied alternately to each victim, who is most fantastically arrayed in a peaked cap and short mantle bedecked with ribbons. A large patch of scarlet cloth is sewn on his shirt over the region of the heart. In addition to the human beings publicly sacrificed at the religious ceremonies, the amazons are allotted a very large number of victims, which they take to their quarters within the palace to torture and kill at their pleasure. No man is allowed to be present to inquire too inquisitively into their horrible and peculiar rites.

Dahomey is the only country in the world which makes women a part of its military system. In the year 1729 the king, hard pressed by enemies, placed a large number of armed women among his soldiers. These women acted with such signal bravery and fought with such abandon and ferocity in the battles which brought victory to Dahomey that they were organized into a permanent regiment.

The flower of the fair sex is likely to get into the army as well as nearly all the strong-minded women, the viragos and the unfaithful wives. Now and then the king takes a consort from his woman regiments, but no other man may marry them. They are known in Dahomey by the names of "Our Mothers," "Tigers of War," and the "King Wives." They live in the king's palace and there perform their fetish mysteries. The amazon that sworn to perpetual celibacy and at the gate of their dwellings a curious fetish is hung, which is supposed to insure certain exposure to any amazon that has broken her vow of celibacy. The very fear of this fetish often causes an amazon who has gone astray to confess her sin. There are occasions, however, when violations of these vows are permitted and the moral code is completely relaxed. When the king sends his amazons through the country to enlist men for the army the fair recruiting agents are permitted to offer any inducement they please to tempt men into the ranks. The women are taught that they are not weak, but strong. Every womanly sentiment is suppressed and they become unsexed and unnaturally ferocious. The recruits are subjected to a very severe drill, which fortifies them to endurance of all kinds of hardships and physical pain. They are compelled to sleep outdoors in all kinds of weather, and are beaten, cuffed and kicked with amazing frequency, but everything is submitted to without murmur.

Col. Dodds declares that in all his experience he has never met with such ferocious bravery as that exhibited by the amazons. He says that the amazons are by far the most formidable of King Behanzin's forces. They only fire at close range for a few minutes, then throw away their guns and uttering terrific screams and yells charge madly against the ranks of the enemy, using their large, curiously shaped knives with a fury that death alone will end. Even when shot down and trampled under foot they will fight to the last gasp, stabbing blindly at their assailants above, biting and tearing the legs of those standing over them. Before going into battle the amazons are given liberal quantities of rum, which gives them the frenzied fierceness and daring recklessness which always mark their attacks.

The uniform of the amazons is a short, sleeveless tunic of blue and white native cloth, with short half Turkish trousers and a curious headdress ornamented with horns. Old and young, ugly or handsome, they are all alike marvelous to see. As full of muscles as the male warriors, their attitude is as well disciplined and correct, and the leaders of each regiment are easily recognized by their rich attire and ferocious aspect. This is probably their last appearance on the field of battle, as France, when it annexes the Dahomey territory, will abolish this army of she-devils.

PROVO LETTER.

Provo, Nov. 22.—"McAllister L. C. (the coming man)" in a small, cramped hand was on Sunday evening placed on the register of the Hotel Roberts by a man about thirty years of age, dressed in a neat business suit and wearing a light-gray overcoat. The man took his seat by the stove and commenced a conversation with several of the guests. A peculiar conversation it was. "Yes, I am Christ," he said, "and I can cure any disease you may have. I don't have to work for a living, any man I ask for anything must give it to me," etc. And in proof of his assertion, he persuaded one of the guests to give him a dollar. Subsequently, he went to the Baptist church, where services were being held, and interrupted the pastor in his text, accusing him of preaching false doctrine. He then went back to the hotel and retired for the night. During the whole of yesterday he paraded the street, proclaiming the doctrine that he had great supernatural power. He has been a resident of Neil Johnson's house in this city for about three years. It is said that he has become demented because the lady whom he adores has failed to reciprocate. At a late hour last night McAllister was locked up in jail.

A fifty dollar prize has been awarded to Hammond Simmons of Spanish Fork for raising the best five acres of sugar beets. The five acres yielded 106 tons, 880 pounds, for which he received $482.83. Neil Gardner, of the same city, raised 22 tons, 710 pounds, on three-fourths of an acre.

Mrs. F. S. Richards and Mrs. Salisbury were in the city yesterday in attendance at the meeting of the Ladies' County World's Fair association. They expressed themselves as being well pleased with the progress being made in the county. After the meeting they were driven about the city for hours, visiting the various points of interest.

Mrs. Anna K. Smoot, president of the Primary association for Utah Stake, suggested a novel design to represent the children of the Territory at the World's Fair. She suggests a glass and silver beehive, containing one grain of sand from each child in the Territory. "For," says Sister Smoot, "our children are as numerous as the sands of the seashore."

The meeting of the Utah county World's Fair association (gentlemen) which was to have been held today, was adjourned until Friday next, at 2 o'clock, a quorum not being present.

At the session of the city council held last night, the following items of business were transacted:

T. O. Jones asked that he be permitted to operate a refreshment stand on the National Bank corner, property owners consenting. Referred to the committee on streets and alleys.

Bids were received for feeding city prisoners, and the contract was awarded to Thomas Fowler at 162-3 cents per man.

The mayor was added to the committee on revision of ordinances.

The committee on fire department were authorized to have a fire alarm box placed in the western part of the city, the telephone company having consented to the use of their telephone system without charge.

The recorder and marshal were instructed to report to the council the amounts, if any, they had paid for printing or publishing out of their contingent funds, without submitting same for the approval of the council. This order was made, Mr. Maiben explained, on account of an article which had appeared in a public journal (Enquirer) charging that printing was being done and paid for by city officers indiscreetly without the knowledge of the council.

Chief Justice Zane came down from Salt Lake last night and opened the November term of the First district court.

The following business was transacted:

In the divorce case of Sarah Jane Houts vs. Philip Houts, defendant was restrained from disposing of his farm until a hearing could be had.

Chara Hall, of Springville, was granted a divorce from E. J. Hall on the grounds of cruelty and drunkenness. Plaintiff was given the custody of the children and the home, consisting of a house and lot.

Ray Westwood, of Springville, aged 17, the son of J. M. Westwood, and who was recently arrested in a gambling hell in Salt Lake, by Marshal Hall, for having stolen $111 from his father, was ordered sent to the Reform school.

In the case of W. H. Gage vs. Geo. Haverkamp a decree of foreclosure of mortgage was ordered.

The case of the People vs. Bartholomew, and of the People vs. L. A. Scott Elliott were ordered dismissed on motion of Prosecuting Attorney Zane.

Court was adjourned until December 17th, by which time Judge Blackburn will have returned from his vacation.

Provo, Nov. 23.—School was commenced yesterday morning in the new school house (Timpanogos) with 171 pupils. The principal is B. P. Eggertson, Jr., and his assistants are Mrs. Hattie Abbott and Miss Daisy Moore. The school house is two stories high, but the second story is not yet finished. In each story are three class rooms 24 by 32 in size and a teacher's room 7 by 9. When completed, the building will accommodate 400 pupils. It is constructed of red sandstone and brick.

Mr. Pruts, employed at the Speckhart meat market, met with an accident yesterday afternoon, of a rather ludicrous nature, but which might have been of a much more serious nature. A sausage mill has been placed in position at the Sun Foundry & Machine company shops, and while he was up among the belting and shafting, putting the belt on the proper wheel, his coat sleeve was caught in the machinery, and he was thrown over against a piece of frame work. He braced himself as best he could and struggled hard to get away; but the machinery seized on one piece of clothing after another, until he had nothing left on his person but shoes, stockings and a few shreds of underclothing. He escaped, however, without sustaining any more serious injuries than a few severe bruises. The foundrymen loaned him a coat and some overalls, and he was taken home. He will be out again in a day or two.

The McKinley club of Spanish Fork tendered their friends a reception last night. A sumptuous repast was served at six o'clock and dancing commenced at eight.

The Provo Republican drum corps gave the initial ball of the season in this city this evening. It is expected that Hon. Frank J. Cannon will be in attendance.

Several cases of diphtheria have appeared in Pleasant Grove. Florence, the little daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Jos. B. Clark, has fallen a victim to the dread disease.

On Sunday, Emma, the two years old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James L. Brown, of Pleasant Grove, passed away; and the next day at almost the same hour, another little daughter arrived in the family.

The board of education held a session last night and transacted the usual routine business. In response to a report of the committee on finance, setting forth that more funds were needed, the president was authorized to negotiate for a loan of $2000. The committee on finance was further instructed to ascertain the rate per cent of taxation necessary to meet the school expenses of the coming year.

WESTERN NEWS ITEMS.

A Colorado man went to Arriba county, New Mexico, last week and bought 1500 old wethers at $2.25 a head.

From 300 to 400 pounds of gold ore, running from two to three ounces in gold, is daily being taken from the Eagle mine at Eureka.

On the 30th of the present month the Daly mining company at Park City will pay its 69th monthly dividend of $375,000.

Mike Brown and George Hank, two noted outlaws in Wyoming, were found dead a few days ago by their campfire. Vigilantes are at work and intend to put a stop to outlawing in that state.

Enoch Yentser, one of the Tramway's electricians at Denver, has had his eyesight terribly injured by an electric flash while in the discharge of his duties in the electric power station at Grand avenue.

In the United States court at Cheyenne the Shoshone Indian Poobewah, tried for murdering Pamontee while drunk, has been convicted. The evidence was purely circumstantial. The jury, after four hours' deliberation, brought in a verdict of manslaughter.

A large force of men, employed by W. H. Sherman of Los Angeles, have commenced putting in the poles and dynamo along Washington street at Phoenix, Arizona, preparatory to turning the horse car line into an electric road. The work will be completed in thirty days.

A report comes from Sierra county, New Mexico, that very heavy rains have fallen all over the range in that section, the water holes being filled and the district well soaked. Rain also fell plentifully last week in southern San Miguel county, also down along the Pecos, and the grass is showing the benefit of it already.

Stock raising is becoming an important industry in North Dakota and large herds of cattle, bands of sheep and droves of horses flourish and increase rapidly, even when having only the natural grasses for their sustenance. Quite a number of the cattle and sheep are pure bred, which is a good sign for the future of the quality of the stock of that state.

The Spruance-Stanley Cattle company, at one time the owners of the largest and best stocked ranges in southern New Mexico, have disposed of all their stock within the past few days at $3 per head. They have decided to abandon the cattle business, owing to the condition of the industry in these parts.—Stockman.

A freak in the way of a sugar beet was exhibited in Norfolk, Nebraska, last week. When small the beet had run up through a beef steak bone. As it grew the bone acted as a circling band about the center of the beet, the top and bottom bulging out to three or four times the size of the bone, which it still carries with it. It is from the field of O. B. Hazen and is quite a curiosity.

The Logan hotel at Shoshone, Idaho, has been burned to the ground. The loss is $3000 and was covered by insurance. The fire is supposed to have originated from a defective flue in the kitchen, and there being no water works the building was soon at the mercy of the flames. Most of the furniture was saved. Fortunately for the Union Pacific Railroad the wind was favorable, otherwise the depot building opposite would undoubtedly have been consumed also.

In many districts of Colorado coal is so plentiful in the foothills contingent to the agricultural districts says Field and Farm, that the farmers are now engaged hauling their winter supply. This coal is mined in a crude way and hauled when the farmers' teams are not required for other farm work, and in many cases farmers haul enough coal to last the year through. The counties in which farmers are thus blessed with such cheap fuel are Larimer, Boulder, Jefferson, Gunnison, Mesa, Rio Blanco and Las Animas counties.

Last Thursday the mines at White Hills, known as the Shafer group, were sold to C. W. Berry and R. T. Root, two well known mining men of Denver, Colorado, for $250,000. These mines are the most valuable discoveries made on the Pacific coast in recent years, and are worth much more than the sum paid for them. The mines are now on a steady paying basis, and the erection of reduction works on the ground will greatly augment the output. The management will immediately erect a large boarding and bunk house for workmen.—Mohave Miner.

Cheyenne Leader: Judge Scott has granted restraining orders in the White case. The parties restrained were the Penn Cattle company, Clerk Silas A. Guthrie, of Converse county, the General Trust company of New York, the Ogallala Land and Cattle company and the Union Mercantile company. They are all denied the privilege of disposing in any way of the White securities given by C. A. White by his wife to secure the payment of a note for $75,000. This is the case which created such a sensation recently at Cheyenne.

Hugh McDonald brought in and presented today to Colonel Hafford a human head that he found near the spot where a man's remains were discovered in the Sulphur Spring valley a few months ago by W. H. Finley. So states the Arizona Prospector. It will be remembered that Mr. Finley did not find the head but all the other bones were scattered around. Mr. McDonald lassoed a coyote a few days ago and in the skirmish pulled up a bunch of bear grass on which he beheld the head of a man. Upon examination he found it complete and brought it in yesterday and presented it to Col. Hafford. There is a bullet hole through it directly over the ear, leaving no doubt but that the unfortunate unknown traveler was murdered. The coyote had carried his head to the spot where it was found.

Christine Sorenson, a young Swedish girl who has been a consumptive patient at the city and county hospital for several months, made two unsuccessful attempts last night to end her life, first by suffocation and then by hanging herself. About a week ago she went to the kitchen of the hospital, procured a knife and threatened the lives of a number of patients and nurses. She was subdued and confined in a room by herself, and the physicians waited for developments of insanity. Last evening one of the nurses discovered an odor of escaping gas, and upon investigation found that the girl had turned on the jet in her room. The nurse sent for Dr. May, the resident physician, but before he reached the ward the desperate girl had fastened a bandage tightly about her neck and tied it to a door knob, and lay there slowly suffocating. She was restored by prompt treatment, and the doctor ordered her strapped down to prevent a recurrence of the attempts. — San Francisco Chronicle.

Ben Blanchard, who came to Cheyenne well recommended about six months since, is now being hunted by Sheriff Kelley of that city. In Kansas Blanchard undertook to organize a company that would construct and operate a smelter. The citizens contributed $200,000 in cash and property, but it was not turned over to him, as the committee in charge of it grew suspicious of his motives and power to carry out his promises. As the agent of a mythical eastern syndicate he began operations contracting for many things which he paid for in promises, and in one instance forged a draft for over $500 on a Terre Haute, Ind., bank. The draft was rejected, and the man to whom it was given swore out a warrant for Blanchard's arrest. It is on this charge that Sheriff Kelley is now endeavoring to arrest him in Kansas. Had Blanchard been successful in his plans, which were very ingenious, he would have bunched the city out of $200,000. — Carbon (Wyoming) Journal.

RELIGIOUS.

Sunday Services.

Religious services were held at the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Sunday, November 20th, 1892, commencing at 2 o'clock p. m., President Angus M. Cannon presiding.

The choir sang the hymn commemorating:

Great God, indulge my humble claim;
Thou art my hope, my joy, my rest.

Prayer was offered by President Hugh S. Gowan.

The choir sang:

While of these emblems we partake
In Jesus' name, and for His sake.

The Priesthood of the Sixteenth ward officiated in the administration of the Sacrament.

ELDER JAMES H. ANDERSON

was first called upon to address the congregation. He said he realized to some extent the responsibility resting upon him as a servant of the Lord in bearing his testimony to the truth. He was thankful for the opportunity he had in again associating with his brethren at home, and he was also thankful for the experience he had had in traveling abroad as a missionary. He had been in Great Britain in that capacity and he had felt blessed in the work both in the field as a preacher of the Gospel and when laboring in the office in Liverpool. He could now through his own experience testify to the fact that the Lord sustains those who put their trust in Him. The speaker had visited the various conferences in Great Britain. The people are, as a rule, indifferent to the principles of the Gospel, but he also met with some who are willing to listen to the testimony and render obedience to the word of God. In meeting with these, the missionaries rejoice. The speaker had during his absence realized the great truth that the kingdom of God was not of this world. It does not depend on the world for its existence. There is a contrast between these two. The world hates the followers of Christ, because they are not of the world. They are called out of the world, in order to bear fruit that may remain. The speaker further dwelt on this thought and explained the great difference between the world and the kingdom of God. He then testified that the power of the Almighty rested upon the missionaries, and that their work was not without fruit.

The Lord has established this work and will carry it out until His kingdom is established and the blessings of heaven rest on the children of men.

PRESIDENT HUGH S. GOWAN

was the next speaker. He said his appearance before the congregation today was unexpected, but he wished to be guided by the Holy Spirit in his remarks. He had felt comfort in listening to the testimony of the preceding speaker, for it is always pleasant to hear that the Lord is faithful to His promises and blesses His servants.

It was also pleasing to him to have an opportunity of bearing a testimony to the truth of the Gospel as revealed in these latter days; to partake of the sacrament and listen to the servants of God. He prayed that the testimony may be strengthened and the Saints found always faithful, never indulging in anything that is calculated to destroy their faith in the Gospel. The speaker had noticed that some seem to be cast down on account of circumstances that surround us. He would say, that he had a wish that we all may be found true and faithful. Fear will not enter the heart of one who is living in harmony with the Spirit of God, who gives light and helps us in all things. We should therefore live so that we can have this Spirit. The ordeals we are passing through are a means of education in spiritual things. In whatever condition we as a people came, God is over us for good, as He has been in the past, from our gathering out of the world and until the present day. But it is necessary to have a testimony daily. There is no other means of being safe and progressive. When different opinions and ideas are presented before us and we have to decide, it is necessary to do so with a view to the best interests of the kingdom of God. The Lord must prove His people, that He may know on whom to rely. It is even possible that those who have been tested before in the early days of persecution, may yet have ordeals to pass through, as difficult to endure as the early ones. But if we only have the Spirit of the Lord within us and a testimony of the truth, we can bear all things and become victorious. When this Spirit prevails, it will prevent all contention, ill-will and desire for revenge, and instead of these feelings, peace and harmony will prevail and our life will agree with the divine law.

The question whether we live in harmony with the law of God is an important one to all who call themselves Latter-day Saints.

PRESIDENT GEORGE Q. CANNON

occupied the remainder of the time. He read a portion of the 21st chapter of Exodus, containing the law of retaliation as given by Moses to Israel. He also read the law of the Gospel bearing upon the same subject and given by Christ, as recorded in Matthew 5. He then made some clear and forcible remarks explaining that the condition of Israel was such that they could not receive a higher law than that of retaliation, and pointed out the reasons why the people were in that condition. Jesus came and taught a higher law, one that will lift men nearly to the level of angels and prepare them for the reception of the Spirit of God. The Saints, he said, are under this law of the Gospel, and unless they live in accordance with it, returning good for evil, they are not the Saints of the most High, no matter what they profess themselves to be.

The choir sang the anthem, "The heavens are telling the glory of God." Benediction by W. C. Dunbar.

Master Mechanic Small of the Southern Pacific and several other officials of the same road, arrived in Ogden yesterday morning and spent the day looking over the proposed site for the shops. Yesterday $10,000 of the $30,000 asked by the company as a bonus, was obtained from one source alone, and the balance of the sum is guaranteed so that the shops for Ogden are now assured.

7. Woman's Sphere.

By One of the Sex.

The Lives We Live.

WHAT IS A "SOFTIE?"

They all sat chatting, two young girls and a married couple. The girls had just admitted that they were wishing for some good, jolly and nice beaux. But where were they to be found? The married man replied by naming a certain young man, who is certainly clever, well off, moral, and indeed is what could almost be called a model young man.

"Oh, but you wouldn't suggest that we should go with W—? Oh no, no, never. Not even if we never get another beau."

"Why not, pray?" asked the married man.

"Oh, he is too soft for anything; mush, mush, mushy, mush. Oh, oh! And both young ladies raised their hands in disgust and laughing remonstrance.

"We—" remarked the man, "I have known W— for years, and I can say that he is as good a young man as ever lived. If you girls are lucky enough to get such a husband as he will make you will be more than lucky, you will be blessed."

"Maybe so, but I will take a man not so good and not a bit soft," said one of the girls.

"Well, what is soft? What do you mean?" asked the puzzled man.

"Oh, I know what sort of boys or young men they mean," answered the married woman; "but I can't say why they are soft. Now, there is Johnny L—, he's soft."

"I should say so," chorused both the girls; "terribly, horribly soft."

"And M— and J—, they are soft, too, aren't they, girls?"

"Soft is no name for it. I just hate them all. I'll never get married if I have to marry such men as that."

"Well, but I haven't found out yet what a 'softie' is! Stop your laughing, girls, and tell me at once."

This was impossible to do. For although every Eve's daughter appealed to would give precisely the same decision as that given by the careless girls, yet not one of them could define what the particular quality meant. The disgusted married man remarked that he guessed it was because the young men alluded to were not dudes.

No, that was not it; it is an indefinable, illusive, and yet perfectly tangible something that floats about some men as an atmosphere. As one of the girls remarked, a man don't need to open his mouth; if he is soft, it will be seen in his smiling countenance. Certain it is, that reserved and taciturn men are rarely soft, and yet even yet, I have seen a very reserved and silent man, whom the girls used to call soft in his young days. After a man is married, he loses much of that softness, if he is lucky enough to get married, and he will find it easier to get along with women than before, when he was single. Can any of you, dear friends, solve this riddle and tell us why some men are soft?

FRIENDSHIP.

Have you a friend? Cherish her, love her, and oh, do not criticise her too harshly. The day may come to you as it does to others, when your friends will need and cherish you. Be gentle, and if your friend needs some words of rebuke, or sharp criticism, administer them to her, in all sharpness, as you may be admonished by the Spirit. Yet, afterwards, as God tells you, show forth greater kindness, lest she esteem you an enemy. Does your friend do that which you think foolish or ill-advised? Tell her of it, don't tell others about it. She will love you for your frankness, for a true friend will never cover up your faults when they should be reformed. Would you make any sacrifice for your friend? Then remember that the sacrifice of cruel words unspoken if they bubble up to your lips when she is absent will be of more worth as friendship's offering than presents of jewels and fine purple. Is your friend given to grievous faults? Talk of them to no one but herself, and defend her when others would drag out her faults to exhibit. Does the dissection of your friends' spiritual nature ever wear a sort of cannibal aspect to you? Then love your sister, speak well of her and sharply to her. Such is true friendship, and such is worth a world of sacrifices and long suffering.

The Food We Eat.

We were talking last week about dinners. Let us exchange some ideas about soup. In some families soup appears on the table as an introduction to the dinner. But in most of cases, at least outside of the city, soup, when cooked, is the staple part of the dinner. There are many kinds of soup, from the hastily prepared vegetable soup to the elaborate mock turtle soup. The first and most important thing to watch in the preparation of this food, is that the grease is all skinned off, and that it is not served full of scraps of meat, bits of bone and strings of vegetables. If you are making your soup from ends and fragments of meat, or if you do not intend having the meat served at dinner, it is best to put the meat on with cold water, as they will draw all the juices into the water as it becomes heated. If the meat is to serve as the piece de resistance for the dinner, you will need to pour boiling water over the meat when you put it into the pot, so that the juices may all be kept in.

CLEAR SOUP.

Half an hour before dinner, cut up some onions, a carrot, a small turnip and if you choose, a few cabbage leaves. Let these boil hard until it is ready, when the soup should be carefully strained through a sieve and served with a slice of lemon.

GREEN TOMATO SOUP.

A quarter of an hour before dinner, cut up three ripe tomatoes, or take a few canned tomatoes, put them into the soup liquor with a small onion cut up. Let these cook until five minutes before ready to serve. Beat an egg, thicken it with a large teaspoonful of cornstarch or flour, add a piece of butter the size of an egg and a teaspoon of cream. The grease of your soup should have been most carefully removed while cooking. When your mixture is well beaten, add it to the soup, let it boil up for a moment, then strain it through a colander and serve with crackers or toasted bread. This makes a good dinner, if the meat is taken out of the pot previous to the cream being added. Some strain the soup before thickening, but it is less trouble and just as good to do so after all is cooked. I learned to make this delicious soup from a most excellent cook and housekeeper, Aunt Lucy.

BEAN SOUP.

This soup is made in a family whose table is always spread with simple food and whose door is always open to receive friends. Your beans should be cooked the day before, and if you choose you can go through the tedious process of straining them through the strainer the night before you use them. Let me advise you to take a quart of beans (for a large family), soak them over night, cook them fifteen minutes the next day in soda water, then throw the water off, put them in the oven or in the pot with some good soup liquor and a piece of fat meat. When they are cooked soft, you can, if you choose, pour them into a baking dish, put a generous lump of butter on them with pepper (the salt should be boiled in them), then bake them for half an hour and you will find them delicious. Or you can serve them as boiled beans and they will be enjoyed. The next day, take what beans are left, we hope you had at least a pint left, mash them through a sieve, and hard work it is, too; but if you will put a little water in it will help you in straining them and then put them on the stove with a little water and about a quart of good rich milk. You should put them in a double kettle, if you have one, and if not improvise one by putting a lard bucket in your stove pot; in about fifteen minutes after they have begun boiling, taste them and season them or rather it, for it is soup now, and dish and send to the table very hot. Fresh bread and butter make a delightful accompaniment to this soup.

NOODLE SOUP.

This soup may or may not have vegetables cooked in it, just as you please. When nearly ready to serve, add noodles prepared in the following manner: Beat up an egg, and add flour enough to make rather a stiff dough. I always put the merest pinch of yeast powder into the flour, but it is not necessary; roll out the dough into a very thin sheet, sprinkle thickly with flour, roll up like a sheet of paper or a music roll, then with a sharp knife cut the roll into thin slices. If you have thoroughly floured the dough, the strips will fall apart like a thread. These should be cooked about ten minutes.

DUMPLINGS.

Either vegetable or plain soup can be used for dumplings, but it is better to have a few potatoes if any, as the dumplings thicken the soup. Dumplings should be cooked in a close and well-covered pot for a quarter of an hour, and then taken up at once. The lid should not be lifted while they are cooking. The receipt for them was given me years ago by the same friend who taught me to make bean soup. Into a quart of flour sift either a teaspoon (an even teaspoon) of soda, if you are going to use buttermilk, or two teaspoonfuls of yeast powder if sweet milk is used. Pour in the milk or buttermilk until a thick batter is made, about the same consistency as if they were to be rolled out in biscuits; but do not roll them out. Just leave them in the batter and dip a large tablespoon at a time into your soup, and then shut up the pot close and let them cook. You should serve them on a large platter, as it is not good for them to be piled one on top of another. This quantity is for a large family. My friend used, and I dare say she does to this day, to boil them in salted water and serve them up for dessert with cream and sugar. And they make a very good dessert, too. Try them.

DANISH, OR CLARA'S DUMPLINGS.

A good Danish sifter once brought me some of the most toothsome dumplings I ever tasted, and the other day, my aunt made me some more. They are real Danish dumplings, and if you like good things, make some. Put about a teacupful of milk into a spider or saucepan; when it boils, thicken it with flour until it is like smooth mush. Take it up, and add when cool a well beaten egg. This can be set aside and used whenever you wish, as it will keep for several days, especially in the winter. When ready for dumplings, take this mixture out in a dessert spoon and put it in the soup. It will come out the shape of an egg if you are careful in dipping it with the spoon, and it is very delicious. My Danish friends sometimes add spices, such as nutmeg or cinnamon, but I prefer them with only the salt as flavoring.

Selected Receipts

Johnny Cake.—Take one cup each of sour milk and Indian meal, and two-thirds of a cup of flour, one small teaspoonful of soda, one-half teaspoonful of salt, three tablespoonfuls of sugar, two tablespoonfuls of melted butter and one beaten egg. Add the milk, in which the soda is dissolved, to the egg, salt and sugar; stir in the butter, meal and flour, rapidly, and bake thirty minutes in a quick oven. Sweet milk and one heaping teaspoonful of baking powder may be substituted for the sour milk and soda.

White cake.—Rub to a cream two cups of sugar and two thirds of a cup of butter. Sift one teaspoonful of baking powder into three cups of flour and add, alternately, with one cup of milk to the cream. Beat thoroughly the whites of seven eggs and cut and fold them into the mixture. Use almond flavoring or lay thin strips of citron on the batter while pouring it into the pan. Bake from forty-five minutes to an hour in a slow oven.

Eggless Cake.—One cupful of sugar, one cupful of sour milk, one cupful of chopped and seeded raisins, one-half cupful of flour, one teaspoonful of soda, one teaspoonful of cinnamon, one-fourth teaspoonful of cloves, half a nutmeg.

One-egg Cake.—Cream one cupful of sugar and one-half cupful of butter; add the beaten yolk of one egg, beat all together; one teaspoonful of soda dissolved in a very little boiling water and one-third cupful of sour milk; beat again; add one and one-half cupfuls of flour, slowly stirring it smooth all the time; and lastly the well beaten white of the egg.

Sponge Cake.—Two eggs well beaten, one cupful of sugar, one cupful of flour (before it is sifted), one teaspoonful of cream of tartar sifted with the flour several times, one teaspoonful of extract of lemon, one teaspoonful of salt. Stir all together until perfectly smooth, then add one teacupful of boiling water in which one-half teaspoonful of soda has been dissolved; stir briskly and put in the oven as soon as possible.

Sponge Pudding.—Three well-beaten eggs, one cupful of sugar, one-half cupful of sweet milk, one-fourth cupful of butter, two cupfuls of flour and two teacupfuls of baking powder thoroughly sifted with it. Bake thirty minutes. Eat with lemon sauce. Make as follows: Boil one cupful of granulated sugar in two cupfuls of hot water; wet a tablespoonful of cornstarch in cold water; add to the boiling water and boil ten minutes. Add juice and grated rind of one lemon and a tablespoonful of butter. —From the Housekeeper.

Mrs. Palmer's Codfish Balls.—Take a piece of codfish, not the boneless kind, have it picked and then boil it until it is soft; boil the potatoes in a separate pan; mash the potatoes and codfish together until the mixture is as fine as it can possibly be; take a large lump of butter and add enough milk to make it mix well; mould it in little balls ready to be fried. It is very much better to make the balls the day before they are fried. The proportions are about as follows: To 3 pounds of codfish take 5 pounds of potatoes, 3 eggs, ¼ pound of butter and milk enough to mix it thoroughly.

Chicken pot-pies of New England. Cook the chicken with strips of salt pork until both are tender. Rub butter and flour together and put into the water in which the chicken was cooked. Use enough to make a rich gravy. Make a crust with baking powder, flour, butter and milk, as you would for tea biscuit. Roll out the crust to about one inch of thickness and spread it over the pot, cutting it in various places. Let boil for twenty-five minutes and serve as nicely as possible. You will have a delicious dish and one which will make you dream of your mother's cooking.

Mrs. Croly's plum pudding. Take one pound of fine bread crumbs; two tablespoonfuls of flour; eight eggs, well beaten; one pound of clean currants; half pound beef kidney suet; one pound of cut and stoned raisins; two ounces of mixed candied citron, lemon and orange peel; half cup, not more, of granulated sugar; one even small teaspoonful of salt; one large or two small nutmegs grated. Mix, either with sweet cider or with Catawaba wine, using rather more than a pint—enough to make it stir thick. Boil in a quart mould, well buttered. It must be tied down very firmly and must boil, without ceasing, for four hours. When it is turned out on a china dish have ready a cup of blanched almonds, and stick these in the pudding. Just before bringing it in, pour cognac over it and set fire to it. Serve with a rich sauce.

"By clean currants," said Mrs. Croly, "I mean that you are to buy what called clean currants and then rub them through a colander with flour. This removes the broken stems and the grit which always clings to them. The suet is also to be chopped fine in flour and strained through a colander. I use only wine from which the fusil oil has been extracted. At Christmas, of course, the pudding is decorated with mistletoe and holly berries." —The World.

Fair Hands for All.

Sunday Journal.—What is rarer than a beautiful hand, beautifully kept? Nothing.

What avails a lovely face and figure, though perfectly gowned, if your eyes are soon to be shocked by the sight of a rough, red hand, with ill-kept finger nails, or, rather, nails that are strangers to any keeping at all?

The latest method in artistic manicuring demands that the hands be given a thorough massage previous to the commencement of the treatment proper.

It is highly grateful to the tired hands of the pianist and writer, as well as the weary, work-stiffened fingers of the typewriters and all others who earn their bread by the sweat of the hands. It strengthens and refreshes the hands, giving that feeling of exquisite cleanliness which a Turkish bath imparts to the body.

The question is often asked: "Why are my hands so rough and yours so smooth?" This question is best answered in the Yankee fashion by asking another: "What kind of soap do you use?" The fair customer looks as though you suspected her of using a cheap article. Ten to one she will immediately give you the name of some highly perfumed soap and will seem greatly surprised when you explain that the unperfumed soaps are the best. A goodly share of all the troubles of the skin of the hands originates from the diseased, fatty matter in highly scented soaps. Always endeavor to use a soap that will replace as much of the natural oil of the skin as possible, for it is that only which keeps the skin soft and smooth.

Owing to the excessive dryness of our American climate we need to hold in all our natural oil if we would keep at bay that foe of women's happiness—wrinkles.

The outer or scarf skin, through dryness, becomes looser than the under layer, hence wrinkles. And right here is the place to say a word about the "instantaneous wrinkle removers," which are professed to do away with wrinkles of both young and old. There is no preparation yet discovered which will in itself accomplish this. But in the hands of a scientific "masseur," and with the aid of a pure oil, they can by constant care be kept away, but not through any virtue of the preparation used.

The massage will strengthen the muscles which have become flabby and the oil will feed and fatten the skin, thereby causing it to become smooth and firm.

If you would have smooth, white hands, keep them out of hot water. Use a pure soap and always take time to thoroughly dry them.

Too frequent use of the nail-brush will cause that painful condition of the finger ends called hang-nails.

Never bite or tear them off, but clip with a sharp pair of scissors and anoint with a little cold cream to prevent the irritation which would otherwise arise.

Never put steel instruments under the nails. Every time one is used you unconsciously prick the delicate skin and soon you will begin to notice a dark, dirty line under the nails, for which you can not account, and which nothing will remove but time and disuse of the steel instruments.

A little orange wood stick will be found to be a very effective agent with which to clean the nails, and to daily press away the encroaching skin which seems so determined to hide from view that chief beauty of our nails, the ball moon.

If the hands are rough, wear a loose pair of kid gloves. Allow them to remain on all night. In the morning wash in tepid water, using a little French almond meal, and your hands will be much improved.

Highly polished, pointed and painted nails have long since been discarded, except by those with whom exaggeration is a card.

A nail should keep as far as possible the general outline of the finger's end. But there can be no rule in this matter, as the nails, like the hair, should be cut in the manner most becoming to the wearer.

Give a little more attention and time to this particular branch of the toilet and I am sure, by your improved feelings and appearance, you will be more than repaid.

The Clothes We Wear.

HOW TO CLEAN FURS.

Notwithstanding the old idea that really good furs will wear forever, the owner of a nice sealskin jacket, or a fine ermine cape, cannot repress a sigh of disappointment when she looks at her furs for the first time since their long summer seclusion.

"It may be true," sighs she, "that my furs will never wear out. But it is equally true that they look very shabby after lying in a camphor chest for six months. Why, some of this fur is so flattened that it actually looks as if it were moth-eaten."

If a furrier has had charge of the furs during the summer they are all right now, for a dealer has every convenience for cleaning and keeping furs. But if the home mother has taken them into her own keeping she will no doubt be glad, at this time, to learn how her treasures may be renovated and made as "good as new."

Ermine and sealskin are best cleaned with soft flannel. Rub the fur delicately against the grain, and when it has been thoroughly lifted and reversed, so to speak, dip the flannel into common flour and rub lightly any spots that look dark or dirty. Shake the fur well and rub with a clean, dry flannel until the flour is all removed.

Sable, chinchilla, squirrel and monkey skin may be very nicely cleaned with hot bran. Get a small quantity of bran meal and heat it in the oven until it is quite warm. Rub stiffly into the fur and leave for a few minutes before shaking to free it from the bran.

Mink may be cleaned and freshened with warm cornmeal, and, like the other short haired furs, may be done without removing the lining. But the long-haired furs are best ripped apart and freed from stuffing and lining.

Those who may not care to go to the trouble of taking fur garments apart will find that the simple remedies described will go a long way towards making the jackets and capes look clean, even if not ripped apart.

ALWAYS IN FASHION.

It is stated with a good deal of gravity, that "to be economical is to be fashionable." Now this may or may not be true, but one can be assured that proper economy is always in good taste, and the taking good care of one's wardrobe a sign of good-breeding.

A little economy worth practicing consists in straightening out a bunch of crushed flowers, to be placed upon an evening chapeau and draping over with some illusion, which, contrasting in color, will freshen the blossoms, which may have suffered in service.

Loosely fold and place in a box the face veils now so generally worn.

It is a good thing to preserve black silk mits, even when they are past wearing, for when an unsightly rip that cannot be mended comes in the thumb of a new pair, the skillful needlewoman can cut a new thumb from an unworn part of the old mit, and after carefully shaping it like the other, insert it in the new pair. This bit of needle-work will often save the price of a new pair.

The lightest gloves clean best. Like light silk vest fronts they are easily cleaned in gasoline when soiled.

Another thing the economical woman does is to always keep a small bottle of olive oil for the sole purpose of rubbing off her walking shoes. This preserves the leather and keeps them looking just like new. In the matter of gowns and the small belongings of the toilet, be as economical as you deem proper, but do not hoard up your pleasant words, your smiles and good humor; unlimited extravagance in these is to be encouraged, for unlike other excesses, it will bring back on the outlay a hundred per cent. of happiness.—Housekeeper.

Our Children.

Says a correspondent of the New York World: I should like to say a few words in answer to a letter which appeared some time ago in a valuable paper regarding the punishment of children.

I think that more often than not unruly children are the results of selfish training on the part of their mothers, for all training is selfish, whether it be over-indulgent or neglectful, which is due to any other motive than the good of the child concerned.

There never was, I think, since time began a really good mother who had a bad child, but there are a great many so-called good and religious mothers who have very bad children, which, I think, is all due to the same trouble, selfishness. Let a mother be perfectly unselfish and good herself, let her study to remove her own faults, and she will find it much easier to manage her children as she wishes.

Every child is going to be a certain amount of trouble to its mothers, and it depends on her whether she will take it when the child is young, and gently guide its mind, gain its deepest love and confidence, and check and remove its faults while making herself its best beloved, or she will take it in tears and remorse when the child, grown too old to be guided, breaks her heart by neglect and disobedience.

As for a way to punish children, that is no longer a problem when a child known that yes means yes and no, no, and when love and respect go hand in hand. But I do not think that a light spanking ever hurt any child, and it is much to be preferred to various other modes of punishment, such as sending a child to bed or putting in dark closets, which last is perfectly wicked. Only I think that spanking should be regarded as the extreme punishment, never threatened in vain and above all never promised at some future time, as that is the worst kind of cruelty, instead of being a correction as it is meant to be.

But oh, if only more women would realize what a noble thing is a perfect mother, how they would strive to become one; they would count no struggle too hard or sacrifice too great for the attainment of that end.

How grandly the image of a perfect mother stands out in her children's minds, alike their beacon and their compass, her crown her own sweet deeds and untiring tenderness, her mantle the love and reverence of her husband and child. She reigns a queen in her home than whom no sovereign ever had a more enduring throne.

And then if death should call her from them she will have so left her impress and example on her home that those she left shall still continue to follow in her footsteps, loving her more and more, and more and more realizing her perfections until they are again reunited. Who can tell the worth of noble woman? Her price is far above rubies. Her children rise up and call her blessed, her husband also, and he praiseth her. Surely the most beautiful words ever said of woman.

Dresses for Little Girls.

Says the Housekeeper: A very dainty and impressive dress for a girl can be made of plain woolen material, the light shades making up the prettiest; cut a plain round skirt not too full. Just above a hem of about two inches in depth, put three rows of velvet ribbon; make a plain bodice with a round yoke, sew on three rows of velvet ribbon around the yoke; make the belt of the goods, striped with velvet. Sleeves, leg-of-mutton shape, plain at the waist and trimmed with the velvet ribbon, and the collar plain and high.

A charming dress for a little girl of six to nine years is made with a kilted skirt of woolen plaid in red and golden-brown, mounted in box-pleats, vest of gold-brown velvet, to harmonize with color in plaid, and trim with lapels of red silk; this, opening on a waistcoat of the plaid goods, tightened at the waist in front by a silver buckle, puffed sleeves, broad at the shoulder, of plaid with deep cuff of velvet.

CITY COUNCIL.

The City Council met in regular session last night. In the absence of President Loofbourov, Councilman Beardsley was called to the chair. The members present were: Rich, Folland, Karriek, Evans, Horn, Simondt, Wantland, Kelly, Hardy, Moran—11. Absent—Loofbourov, Bell, Helms—3.

Recorder Stanton and his assistant, Elmer Ellsworth, were both absent, and Fred Dennis acted as chief clerk. The minutes of the meeting of Friday night last were read, amended and approved, after which were read and referred as follows:

Groesbeck Brothers asked to be allowed to lay a private sidewalk in front of their new store at 267 south Main street. Board of public works.

The board of education asked for a number of permanent sidewalk grades. Referred to the city engineer.

H. B. Elder and others asked for certain improvements on Seventh West street. Committee on streets.

TO FINISH THE EAGLE GATE.

Spencer Clawson, chairman of the Eagle Gate committee, W. S. McCormick and M. S. Walker and others asked the City Council to appropriate the sum of $1773.19 for the completion of that old land mark, the Eagle Gate. The total cost of construction $4400. The petition was referred to the committee on Improvements.

"PEOPLE'S HOTEL."

Frank Munroe asked the council to give him a hotel liquor license. Mr. Munroe pledges himself to keep a perfectly respectable hotel and saloon in case his petition is granted. The hotel is to be known as the "People's hotel" and is to be run in connection with the variety theater on Commercial street.

FOOD INSPECTOR.

The mayor sent in a communication in which he announced the appointment of A. S. Kendall as city food inspector.

On motion of Moran the matter was referred to the sanitary committee but not until after several of the councilmen had told in glowing language what they knew about the new officeholder and his qualifications as a food inspector.

Kloh asked where Mr. Kendall had obtained his experience.

Kelly responded in "Nephi, Jubah county."

Rich—The meat markets of "Little Chicago" are not very large and if Mr. Kendall's experience is no larger than this burg of the far south I do not anticipate that he will serve the city very well.

Kelly—The meat markets of that city are not very large but their beefs are whoppers—veritable mastadons. (Laughter.) I will say further that I have known Mr. Kendall for years and know him well. He was a school teacher here some years ago and will serve the city with credit. He was raised in a butcher shop and will understand his business.

Moran—Oh, I know lots of members who were raised in the butcher shops but that is no sign that we must make food inspectors of the . . .

Moran then laughed and so did several of his colleagues. Discussion then ceased.

SIDEWALKS.

The city engineer sent in a communication stating that there was no ordinance fixing the sidewalks on First street. He recommended that the width of sidewalks be fixed at about thirty per cent of the width of the streets. This would make the width of the sidewalks as follows: For streets 50 feet wide, 7½-foot sidewalks; 58-foot streets, 8½-foot sidewalks; 60-foot streets, 9-foot sidewalks; 66-foot streets, 10-foot sidewalks; 70-foot streets, 10½-foot sidewalks; 80-foot streets, 12-foot sidewalks; 82-foot streets, 12-foot sidewalks; 89-foot streets, 15-foot sidewalks; 132-foot streets, 20-foot sidewalks. Referred to the committee on streets.

The board of public works sent in a contract with Frank Harrigan for the crosswalks on Main and West Temple streets between Second and Sixth South streets. The contract was approved. The contract price is $2.65 per square yard.

In regard to the complaint of Third South street property owners in relation to the condition of the sidewalk in front of the Brooks Arcade, the street committee's report recommending that, if the owners did not put in a good sidewalk within thirty days the city do the work and charge the same to the property, was adopted.

ARRIVAL OF THE PRESIDENT.

President Loolibow entered the Council chamber at this juncture of the proceedings and Councilman Bearseley vacated his chair for him.

THEY WILL GET LIGHT.

On recommendation of the committee on public works electric lights were ordered erected at the intersection of Eighth West and North Temple streets, Eighth South and Third West streets, Fifth West and Second North streets.

WATER PIPE ORDERED.

The committee on waterworks recommended the purchase of 800 feet of 16-inch and 400 feet of 8-inch water pipe, and that the work of laying the same be prosecuted with all reasonable haste so as not to interfere with street paving next spring. Adopted.

"OLD CROW."

W. F. Shelton, superintendent of sewer, sent in a bill for $1.15 for a bottle of "Old Crow."

This caused a general laugh, and Rich expressed his ignorance as to what "Old Crow" meant.

The chair stated that Crow was what himself and fellow politicians took after election, they having played with the leading side. (Laughter.)

Mr. Lawson said that if it was not absolutely necessary to know where that $1.15 had gone to, he would inform the city treasury sentinels that it had been used for the purchase of a bottle of liquor for a couple of men who were compelled to make a cruise through the sewer to investigate its internal operations. (Laughter.) If some of the councilmen had undertaken the job they would have probably taken several bottles or a barrel with them in order to counteract the effects of the odor so peculiar to sewer mains.

Folland suggested that the free use of coffee would probably have been more effective as a guard against disease.

Jesting continued in this line until the verge of personalities was reached, after which the bill was allowed.

EXTENSION OF FRANCHISE.

The committee on streets reported as follows on the matter of the application of the Salt Lake City Railway company and the protest of the property owners on the same:

First—As to the West Temple and Roper street line, we recommend that the railway company be requested to compact and operate the line on West Temple street for one-third the distance between Ninth South and Roper street, promptly, provided that the property owners set back the fences and widen the street ten feet on each side, as heretofore agreed. We recommend that an extension of six months be given on the remaining part of the franchise, viz., two-thirds of the distance on West Temple street and on Roper street.

Second—As to the Capitol hill line we recommend that the company be requested to accept a franchise along Current street, from Center street to the Capitol grounds, in lieu of the present route via Main street, from First North to the Capitol grounds.

Third—As to the Seventh East and Roper street line, we recommend that no action be taken at present.

We recommend that the papers be referred to the city attorney to prepare the necessary resolutions covering our recommendations.

STREET SPRINKLING CUT DOWN.

After thirty minutes' discussion it was decided to "lay off" about one-third of the sprinkling wagons for the season.

THE PARK COMMISSION MEASURE.

Mr. Lawson's pet measure, an ordinance providing for the creation of a public park commission consisting of five citizens was called up.

Hardy moved to refer it to the city council sitting as a board of revision on ordinances.

Moran moved to amend by postponing action for one week. Lost.

The ordinance was read the first time after which it was laid on the table until the next meeting.

FIREPROOFING PROPOSITION.

City Engineer Doremus then reported on his figures for the fireproofing of the third floor of the joint city and county building. The cost of the floor under the original plan would be $9179.59. To make it fireproof it would cost $25,315.86, a difference of $16,135.97. Fireproofing the third floor would make some additional strength to certain columns on the other floors necessary, and this he estimated at $1200. The contractor's figures were $16,551.59.

The report of the Engineer was referred to the joint city and county building committee, with power to act, by the following vote:

Ayes—Beardsley, Evans, Folland, Horn, Kelly, Loofbourrow, Moran, Wantland—8.

Noes—Hardy, Karrick, Rich, Simond—4.

At the meeting of the City Council last night Horn offered a resolution providing that the street supervisor be authorized to offer a reward of $25 for information that would lead to the conviction of any one who maliciously mutilates or destroys street signs.

Horn stated in support of the resolution that the new signs had cost the city about $3500, and that they were being destroyed in all parts of the city by hoodlums and vandals. He wanted an example made of some one. Whom he did not care as long as he was guilty. He thought a reward would materially assist in bringing the culprits to justice.

Moran said the offering of a reward would simply have the effect of encouraging the boys to break the signs down. If they could get $25 for squealing on a pal they would do it and in that way they would become pretty expensive to the city.

Rich said he had been a boy himself and he knew boys like that. He thought, however, that they should be dealt with when caught, but he was opposed to the resolution.

Kelly took the same view of the matter as Rich.

Simond and Beardsley both thought the boys of Salt Lake were very bad and should be taught a lesson that they would not soon forget. The former declared that the signs were monuments of enterprise on the part of the Liberal administration and should be cared for and protected.

Folland said such remarks were entirely uncalled for from Mr. Simond who was a new comer here. He was contracted in his views and warped in his judgment. Salt Lake City had street signs before Mr. Simond set foot in Salt Lake and they were not placed in position by or at the expense of Liberals either. He thought the committee on improvements who perpetrated the monstrosity of erecting the new signs should be prosecuted instead of the boys whom they were seeking so hard to punish.

On motion of Hardy the resolution was amended so as to make the reward $10 instead of $25.

TO PROTECT THE ASPHALT.

A resolution by Horn prohibiting the building of bonfires upon any asphalt streets of the city was passed and the attorney was instructed to draw an ordinance to that effect.

BUILDING REPORT.

Lawson offered the following which was adopted:

Resolved, That the building inspector of Salt Lake city at once proceed to list and compile with his annual report for the year ending December 31, 1892, all those buildings erected or made during the present year in all those additions and subdivisions adjoining said city on the south and lying between tenth or Roper and Twelfth South streets. That for such services he be paid not to exceed $30 for the time necessarily employed therein.

FOR NEW SIDEWALKS.

Ordinances levying special taxes for the construction of sidewalks were passed as follows:

On both sides of First South street between Eighth and Twelfth East streets. Tax $1.20 per linear front foot.

On both sides of First South street between East and West Temple streets. Tax $5.00 per linear front foot.

On both sides of First South street between East Temple and State streets. Tax $5.00 per linear front foot.

On both sides of Second South street between East Temple and State streets. Tax $5.00 per linear front foot.

THE CITY SHOULD FOOT THE BILL.

Hardy called attention to the claim of Dr. John Park for the breaking down of his fence and dumping gravel on his lot when the contractors were grading State street. It was stated that the matter was in the hands of the engineer. A report on the matter was called for to be presented at the next meeting.

HEISE AFTER WANTLAND.

Heise moved that the committee on streets be reorganized so as to place one councilman from each precinct on the committee. Referred to the president.

THE PARK COMMISSION ORDINANCE came up and was read the first time and after a long and tiresome discussion was laid on the table until the next meeting.

TO REMOVE COBBLESTONES.

Hardy introduced the following, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the street supervisor shall at once be authorized to have all cobblestones and other obstructions on Main street from South Temple to First South street and First South street from West Temple to First East street be removed at once as it is interfering with the business of the merchants on the above streets and that a bill for the expense of same be presented to the contractors for payment.

An adjourned session of the City Council was held last night. President Loofbourrow being absent Horn was called to the chair. The members present were Rich, Folland, Hardy, Karrick, Evans, Beardsley, Heise, Simond, Kelly, Moran, Lawson—11.

Absent—Loofbourrow, Wantland, Bell—8.

The minutes of the three previous meetings were read, amended and approved, after which President Loofbourrow entered and his chair was vacated for him by Mr. Horn.

Councilman Folland called attention to the fact that the communication from Ex-Deputy Recorder, which was rejected on Thursday night, appeared in the minutes and that Deputy Recorder Pro Tem Vandenberg had failed to read it.

President Loofbourrow declared that such omissions made no difference, as there had really been no meeting of the City Council since Tuesday night. The session or alleged session held on Thursday night was informal and illegal. The charter provided that special meetings could be held only when a proper notice or call was issued.

Simond said there certainly had been a meeting and he believed it was a legal one.

Beardsley said that the committee on sewers had not met on Thursday and during their deliberations the councilmen had agreed to meet on Thursday night.

Folland moved that the vote whereby the minutes of Thursday night's meeting was approved be reconsidered in order that the Ellsworth communication might be expunged.

The question was discussed at length and was about to be passed when Mr. Folland asked the chair if it was proper, courteous or legal to read a portion of the minutes and omit the remainder.

The Chair—The minutes ought to be read in full. The entire record of the proceedings of the Council should come before it at its subsequent meeting for approval or disapproval.

Again there was an effort to pass the omitted part of the minutes when Rich sprung the point that only those portions of the minutes which were made were approved. It was, however, passed amidst a good deal of dissatisfaction.

A RECORDER PRO TEM.

Folland and President Loofbourrow held a brief whispered consultation after which the announcement that a deputy recorder pro tem should be chosen in order to legalize the proceedings.

On motion of Heise Clerk Vandenberg was so chosen.

Simond stated that if the meeting of Tuesday night was illegal that Mr. Ellsworth was still deputy recorder and that the appointment of Mr. Vandenberg was superfluous, but the chair held otherwise.

THE PROCEEDINGS.

The regular business of the meeting was then taken up.

MATTERS REFERRED.

W. S. McCormick objected to the location of two electric light poles within the sidewalk curb in front of his building, and suggested that one pole located outside the curb at the corner would answer the purpose. Committee on streets with power to act.

W. S. McCormick presented a bill of $17.08 for the sidewalk intersection at the McCormick block. Referred to board of public works.

F. M. Pinneo and others asked that Goltz street be graded and put in good condition. Committee on streets.

Harris asked that $24.28 special sprinkling tax be refunded, on the ground that there had at no time during the sprinkling season been any street sprinkling in the vicinity of his property. Committee on sprinkling.

MAYOR'S VETO MESSAGE.

The following was read:

To the President and City Council:

Gentlemen—The report of the committee on sewerage recommending the acceptance of the bid of Jones & Jacobs to furnish Worthington sewer pump and plant, adopted by the Council on the 11th inst., authorizes me to close a contract with Jones & Jacobs in accordance with this bid. I respectfully decline to execute this authority for the following reasons, to wit: The city does not own a foot of land at or near the point of the discharge of the sewer pipe connected with the present sewer plant, nor has it ever acquired any easement or right to discharge the sewerage where it has always been done and where it is contemplated that it shall continue to be so discharged. It is a matter of astonishment that the present plant should have been erected at a cost of many thousands of dollars without the city having first acquired rights under which the sewerage could have been discharged without the city becoming liable as a trespasser. It would in my judgment now be unwise to expend the additional amount proposed in increasing the capacity of the present plant without first acquiring, as should have been done in the first instance, the rights which are essential to the continued use of the plant. At present a suit for heavy damages and an injunction is pending against the city, and other suits of a like nature are being threatened. It is not and cannot be reasonably claimed that the city can except by permission or sufferance of the owners of the contiguous lands continue to discharge the sewerage at the present point of discharge; therefore the operation of the present sewerage plant may at the pleasure of such owners be entirely stopped. I therefore recommend that steps at once be taken, either by purchase or condemnation proceedings to acquire for the city such lands or easements as may be found necessary to insure the continuous operation of the present and any future sewer plant which may be erected.

Soon after the inauguration of the present administration, in company with a number of councilmen, I visited the present sewer plant, and such is our astonishment we found that a large portion of the sewerage was being discharged into the Jordan river, for the reason that the quantity of sewerage matter was too great for the capacity of the pump. That the plant itself was located, so to speak, down in a sink hole, and that nearly all of the sewerage came from a point east of a line running north and south sufficient fall to carry away the sewerage by gravitation; that a discharge of a portion of the sewerage into the river was an unavoidable necessity, and must remain so until other means be provided to dispose of the same. For this necessity the present administration is in no wise responsible, but the existence of such necessity imposed upon the Council the duty of devising the means for relief in consequence of which, at my request, Mr. Hardy made a motion for the appointment of a committee, with the city engineer associated, charged with the duty of investigating and reporting to the council upon the practicability and utility of a gravity sewerage line. It was thought that a line following the course of the river would be available and furnish speedy relief; that the idea was a mistaken one has been shown by the report of the committee. The matter is of such complication, magnitude and moment as not to permit of the making of any mistakes, hence delay has been unavoidable. Sanitary considerations as well as the convenience demand that a system of sewerage be at this time adopted that will meet the emergencies of the city for all time. In my opinion the only system that will meet the desired ends is one by which the great body of the sewerage will be carried away by gravitation. Such a system will cost more in the first instance, but in the end will be the most economical and certainly the most effective.

At present the city has a balance in the treasury. It has three hundred thousand of bonds for sale. These assets with the current revenues of the city make it reasonably safe to enter upon an enterprise so costly as the proposed gravity sewer. That the building of such a sewer is an imperative necessity which is present urges itself upon the attention of the Council is certain. I therefore suggest that a point has been reached that the future expenditures of the city should be gauged so as not to endanger this most urgent improvement, and recommend that immediate steps for its construction be taken. With its consummation the proposed plant will be unnecessary. But it is suggested, as it will require a considerable time to build a gravity sewer, that the proposed plant should be built to dispose of the sewerage in the meantime. The present plant after the gravity system shall have been completed will be sufficient to handle the sewerage most of the gravity line for many years to come. The injury arising from the discharge of the sewerage into the river is not so great as has generally been made to appear, of course the water is rendered thereby unfit to drink, but otherwise the river is not near as great a menace to health as the surface closets, wells and cesspools of the city.

I think the best way to meet the emergency would be for the city to furnish artesian water to those who are dependent on the river for water, if any such there be, and until the gravity system shall be completed, let the sewerage run into the river as it has done ever since the present plant was first erected.

I have received the attached communications which explain themselves and to which I direct the attention of the council.

LAND PURCHASE RECOMMENDED.

Superintendent of Waterworks Ryan recommended that the council purchase 100 acres of land in City Creek canyon owned by Samuel Simpson. It contained three good springs and could be bought for $3500. Referred to the committee on public grounds.

TO TAKE UP AND RELAY.

Superintendent of Waterworks Ryan also recommended that before Main street is paved the 12-inch pipe now laid be taken up and relaid thirty-two feet from the curb line on one side the street and an 8-inch main be laid on the other side of the street. Committee on waterworks.

FOOD INSPECTOR'S SALARY.

The committee on sanitation reported recommending that the appointment of A. S. Kendall as food inspector be confirmed. Adopted.

Mr. Kendall's salary was fixed at $100 per month after a thirty minutes' debate and an effort on the part of Kelly, Beardsley, Simonds and Evans to make his remuneration $1800 per year.

Mr. Kendall was required to give a bond of $1000 signed by two sureties guaranteeing the faithful performance of the duties of his office. He is further required to report his labors to the City Council at its first meeting of each month.

TO ABOLISH A COMMITTEE.

Moran took the floor and smilingly moved that the committee appointed several months ago to investigate the condition of Liberty Park and the charges of Mr. Lawson in regard to the disgraceful manner in which it had been kept be abolished.

After some discussion the motion prevailed. Rich only voting against it.

ONLY ON AUTHORITY.

Folland offered the following resolution which was laid over until next Tuesday night:

Resolved, That the street supervisor do work only on the order of the council, except in the matter of repairs which should be done only on the written order of a majority of the members of the street committee.

FAVORS PROVO SLATE.

Hardy offered the following:

Resolved, That the slate used in the first proofing of the roof of the joint city and county building be of Utah slate from the Provo slate quarries and the city recorder shall notify the county court of the actions of this council.

Rich and Kelly spoke against the resolution.

Lawson said he was very much in favor of the resolution but he was sorry to announce that the slate to be used on the joint public building had already arrived from the East and was now being unloaded on the Eighth ward square. Notwithstanding this explanation the resolution was referred to the committee on the joint city and county building.

TO LOWER AN INTERSECTION.

Rich offered the following which was referred to the board of public works:

Resolved, That the board of public works be instructed to cut down the intersection on Main street and First South, pave the same with blocks, and also make crossovers on First South East Commercial street, and on First South West at Richards street, said work to be pushed with all dispatch.

SEWER CONNECTION.

Mr. Lawson offered the following, which was adopted:

Whereas, The committee on sewerage made a report to this Council relative to a petition from the board of education asking for a sewer connection for their Lincoln school, which was granted providing they pay the cost thereof and upon the engineer returning an estimate of cost to the Council, and as the board is very anxious to prosecute this work, and as there will be a question as to the proper manner to make said connection; therefore be it

Resolved, That the same be referred to the sewer committee and city engineer with power to act.

WANT IT ANNULLED.

The petition of the residents along the line of the West side Rapid Transit company on First West, Ninth South and Second West, that the franchise of said company be annulled, on the grounds that the company was not complying with the provisions of its franchise, was referred to the committee on streets.

SHORT WEIGHT IN COAL.

Two ordinances upon the short weight coal matter were then presented.

The first simply required the dealers in coal to furnish a certificate of the weight of the coal delivered by them from a city weighmaster, and provided a penalty of not more than $100 for a refusal to do so.

The second ordinance, offered by Moran, specified that a ton of coal shall be twenty hundred weight and that the dealer shall deliver to the purchaser a certificate of weight from the city weighmaster, showing the weight of the coal and the wagon or cart. For violation of any of the provisions of the bill or the selling for a ton less than 2,000 pounds or any part of a ton in proportion there was a penalty of not less than $20 or more than $50.

Both ordinances were referred to the committee on municipal laws, with instructions to look into the matter of the screening of coal, providing for a check system of weighing, and for other safeguards preventing fraud and deceit on the part of coal dealers.

THE BOARD OF EDUCATION.

The meeting of the Board of Education last evening was presided over by Vice-President Nelson. The other members in attendance were Trustees Alf, Young, Pratt, Pike, Newman, Raybould, Dooly and Baldwin.

WANT TO BE JANITORS.

G. W. Sharp asked for a position as janitor of one of the new school buildings. C. A. Vanderhoof applied 'or he put as janitor of the Lowell school in the Twentieth ward. William Fowler asked for the position as janitor of the Lowell school.

The committee on furniture and supplies will consider these applications.

Clerk McMillan, of the Third district court, forwarded two bills; one for $17 and the other for $21.75. They were accompanied by the following letter: To the Members of the Board of Education:

GENTLEMEN.—Enclosed herewith find bills due me for clerk's fees in the Third district court earned in the cases therein entitled, and which are wholly unpaid.

Mr. P. L. Williams, the attorney of the board, has approved the same as a just charge against your board. If found correct please make appropriation for payment.

Respectfully,

H. G. McMILLAN.

Referred to the finance committee.

NOT REPLIED TO.

The clerk stated that in accordance with a resolution passed at the last evening, he had notified the Hendley & Meyer Engineering company to at once commence work on the heating and ventilating apparatus at the Bryant school, but had received no reply.

SIXTEENTH WARD SCHOOL ROOMS.

From the superintendent of schools the following was read:

Permit me to report that two school rooms already rented from the Sixteenth Ecclesiastical ward are now ready for occupancy. I would respectfully ask for authority from the board to place necessary furniture in the rooms, blackboards, seats, etc., and in conjunction with the committee on teachers engage two teachers for the positions thus created.

Respectfully,

J. F. MILLSPAUGH.

The matter was referred to the committee on furniture and supplies, with power to act.

AS TO SCHOOL BUILDINGS.

The committee on sites and buildings recommended:

First.—That the outside basement walls of the Frank in school be cemented up to the grade line.

Second.—That the piers over the boys' and girls' entrances at the Washington school be increased in thickness and that the walls of the flues be also increased from four to eight inches in thickness from the first story to the roof.

Third.—That four dwarf brick walls be constructed in the Hamilton school building from the basement to the level of the vestibule floor, each to be twenty-one feet long; also, that a partition wall be constructed in the boys' toilet room, so as to divide it into two rooms; also, that the outside basement walls be cemented to the grade line.

Fourth.—That the committee be authorized to rent the Presbyterian building in the Ontario addition, on Second West street, at a monthly rental of $20 per month, and that the clerk execute a lease of the same from September 1, 1892.

Fifth.—That the committee be authorized to lease the Davis building at $18 per month. This building was occupied by the board for school purposes last year at a rental of $10 per month. Mr. Davis, the owner, has increased the size to nearly double its former capacity; we also recommend that said rent be from September 1st.

Sixth.—With reference to the proposition hereto attached of Croxford Brothers & Bryan, contractors of the Hamilton school, to substitute cement for wood walnut through the entire building, your committee recommend that the proposition be not entertained, but that the wooden walnut be put in as provided in the specifications.

Seventh.—That Mr. Pinney be authorized to have galvanized iron roll placed thereon.

The report was approved after some discussion.

FOR THE CITY ENGINEER.

The committee on sites and buildings also reported that the superintendent of buildings in erecting the several school buildings now in process of construction, required at various times, profile of sites, grade of sidewalks, streets, etc., and requested that the clerk of this board be directed to petition the City Council in the name of this board requesting that the city engineer be required to make such surveys as the board of education may require, free of charge.

SCHOOL WORK.

The committee on school work reported that the first purchase of 20,000 slate pencils is exhausted, or about so, and recommended that 20,000 more be purchased. The committee also recommended that the superintendent of schools be granted a leave of absence for a week, commencing Friday, November 25th, for the purpose of visiting the schools of Denver and Pueblo, Colo.

Mr. Dooly moved that the bill of Monheim, Bird & Proudfoot for $244.15 be not allowed. The doors on the Lincoln school in the Sixth ward, he said, were made to swing in, and this was directly against the city ordinance, which provided that all doors on public buildings be made to swing out. As it was the building was a fire trap. When architects drew up plans and specifications against public safety and city ordinances they should be made to change them at their own expense. The motion was approved and the bills to the amount of $3135.10 were ordered paid.

PAYMENT TO MEMBERS.

Mr. Raybould presented the following resolution:

Whereas, It is provided by statute that the members of this board shall be entitled to compensation not to exceed $2 for each session of the board actually attended, and $3 for each day's services performed under direction of the board; and,

Whereas, The condition of the fund under the disposal of this board, prior to the receipt of this year's taxes, was such as to render it inexpedient for members of the board to submit claims for services under said statute; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this board do hereby adopt the following resolutions under the statutory authority governing the compensation of the members, to wit:

First.—That each member of this board shall be paid $2 for each meeting of the board actually attended by him.

Second.—That each member of the board shall in addition thereto be paid $3 per day for each day's services actually and necessarily performed under direction of the board.

Third.—That the compensation hereupon provided shall be paid on duly verified vouchers.

Mr. Baldwin wanted the bills for services to date from March 18, 1892, at which time the last law passed the Legislature. His amendment was not seconded.

The resolution was then passed.

THE HOUR OF OPENING.

Eighty-six school teachers sent in a petition asking that the opening of the schools at 9 a.m. be continued throughout the year instead of 9:30 a.m., during the winter term as the rule calls for. The request was granted.

STAR VALLEY CONFERENCE.

The first quarterly conference in Star Valley was held in Afton meeting house on Saturday and Sunday Nov. 12 and 13, 1892, George Osmond presiding.

Saturday 10 a.m.—President George Osmond spoke on the favorable circumstances by which we were surrounded at the present time and the great advantages arising from the people being self-sustaining, also on the necessity of branching out in different industries.

The Bishops of the several wards gave in their reports which were generally good.

Counselor William W. Burtin next spoke on the great destitution of the poor in the world and the many blessings and privileges the Saints enjoy. He showed how the Saints were blessed above the majority of mankind, also showed how the people had advanced since the first settlement of Utah.

2 p. m.—After the opening services, Brother A. Gardner spoke on temporal matters especially on the raising of small grain.

Brother Samuel Henderson advised the Saints to pray earnestly for wisdom to guide them into all truth.

President George Osmond occupied a portion of the time again in impressing on the minds of the Saints the great responsibilities that were resting upon them. He dwelt a little on tithing and hoped all would keep the Kingdom of God foremost in their minds.

Sunday, 10 a. m.—After opening services Counselor Anson V. Call compared the situation of the people now with that of the people in the early rise of the Church. He felt grieved to hear some complain of their hard lot, and explained what a blessed people we were compared with some of the outside world. He urged the necessity of educating our children and building and furnishing good comfortable school houses.

Brothers Thos. W. Lee and Andrew McComb gave some good advice to the Saints to be industrious and to serve God continually.

2 p. m.—Opening services over sacrament was administered, and Counselor Anson V. Call presented the following names for the further organization of the Star Valley Stake of Zion.

For the Y. M. M. I. A.—Thomas W. Lee, president; Hugh E. Morgan, first, and Byron H. Alfred, Jr., second counselor.

Sunday Schools—Edmund McLatchie, superintendent; Melvin Henderson, first assistant, and Emery Barrus, second.

Relief Societies—Kittie E. Dixon, president; Sarah A. Burten, first, and Jane Parens, second counselor.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Martha E. Roberts, president; Sarah I. Call, first, Alice E. Lee, second counselor.

Primary Association—Annie R. Kennington, president; Alice J. Call, first, Mattie Barrus, second counselor.

President Geo. Osmond and Counselor Wm. W. Burtin made a few closing remarks, asking the Saints to be charitable to each other and kind to all, and strive to fill the positions where unto they had been called. Conference was adjourned for three months.

LETTER FROM TAHITI.

PAPEETE, Tahiti, Society Islands,
October 10, 1892.

Thinking a short letter from this part of Oceania will be interesting to the many readers of the NEWS I submit the following for publication, should it meet with your approval.

We often read letters from different papers, descriptive of the Sandwich, Samoan and New Zealand Islands, while Tahiti and the adjacent islands, being off the great steamship line running from San Francisco to Sydney, Australia, is but little heard of, and doubtless the nature of these beautiful isles of the South Pacific is almost unknown to the majority of the inhabitants of our temperate zone.

There are five islands in this group (Tahiti being the largest). Tahiti, with the Tupaia and Tuamotu islands (the latter group numbering about 100), are all under the French flag. Tahiti and Tupaia, with their adjacent islands, are very productive. All tropical fruits, such as oranges, bananas, mangos, pine apples, etc., grow abundantly. Many choice vegetables of the temperate climate are cultivated and daily brought into Papeete to market by Chinamen, who are the most successful gardeners, and are well rewarded for their produce.

The principal exports are coconuts, copra and vanilla. Some cotton and coffee are cultivated, but not extensively, the buying prices being so low the past few years that the natives have ceased cultivating to a great extent, which is regrettable as they pass their time in idleness, saying there is no profit in industry. A large sugar plantation, known as the Atimono plantation of Tahiti, was successfully run many years ago by a Mr. Stewart, and gave employment to several thousand people. Sugar is now only manufactured for home use, it being claimed that it cannot be shipped and compete with other market prices. Great quantities of ava, an intoxicating beverage, are made from the juice of the sugarcane and sold to the natives, which is the foundation of many evils existing among them.

The Tuamotu Islands, located about 300 miles northeast of Tahiti, unlike the other islands, are not mountainous. They are of coral formation and noted for the superior quality of pearl shell found there, of which there are hundreds of tons shipped annually to different parts of the world. No kind of fruits or vegetables grow on these islands, though the coconut flourishes, and this with the many varieties of fish, forms the natives' principal food, which certainly must be very nutritive, as the natives are of the largest and most corpulent type. The skin of the Tuamotu native is several shades darker than that of the Tahitian, owing to their constant labor in the hot sun and salt water-diving for the pearl shell.

About the year 1850 A. D. the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints had a membership of at least 1400 natives throughout the different groups of these islands. Shortly after the above date the missionaries were compelled to leave, and many of their converts suffered imprisonment for the Gospel's sake at the hands of jealous opponents. Years have passed and "grievous wolves entered, scattering the flock."

On the 27th of January, 1892, myself and companion, Brother W. A. Seemiller, of Richfield, Utah, landed on Tahiti as missionaries of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and upon inquiry we learned that most all the church members of former days were dead, while the younger class, being left so long without a shepherd, had associated themselves with other denominations.

We were greeted with many discouraging remarks, but assured those who could speak English that we had come to stay. Two weeks after arriving we started out, on foot, for a tour of the island, anxious to begin the study of our new language. We were hailed at every town with la orana lapa'a (How are you, strangers?) and when near meal time someone would cry out Haere mai ta mau ta'ou (Come and eat with us!). We soon learned the meaning of these words of greeting, and very thankfully accepted the kind invitation to eat, sleep, etc. It being the rainy season at that time, we had much rain and mud to contend with, and on the east side of the island we had many rivers to wade; but we succeeded in making the tour of one hundred miles around the island, feeling that we had been greatly blessed in our first experience of this kind. We found the native people to be very hospitable and self-sacrificing in their crude mode of living.

June 1st, 1892, we were joined in our labors by Brother James S. Brown and son Elannde, of Salt Lake City, and Elder Thomas Jones of Hooper. Brother Brown fulfilled a mission of three years to these islands forty-two years ago and is well remembered by many of the natives. He is now aged and crippled, but, through his faith, has been strengthened for every trial to date, and says his health is better now than it has been for five years.

Through the blessings of the Lord two baptisms have been made during the past month, one being a native man who was greatly afflicted, and instantly healed by the power of God—through faith. We find the same spirit of prejudice here that the Elders have to contend with in other missionary fields, occasioned by the false statements of the unbelieving. We are diligently striving for a knowledge of the language and with the assistance of divine aid hope to be successful in removing prejudice and implanting the principles of truth instead.

I will add before closing that all navigation from the different islands and to San Francisco is accomplished by sailing vessels only.

Very respectfully,
JOSEPH W. DAMRON.

REMARKS;

Md: by Apostle Francis M. Lyman, on Sunday morning, October 9, 1892, at the General Conferenos, held in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Utah.

[REPORTED BY ARTHUR WINTER.]

I think we should be very grateful to the Lord, who has strengthened President Woodruff and enabled him to speak to us this morning. He has endeavored to portray to us the importance of the work that is entrusted to us as Latter-day Saints. We are required to preach the Gospel, and we are all preachers of the Gospel; and as we heard from President Cannon, no other religious body has such a large percentage of ministers. Every man who has a wife is a minister of the Gospel, and is just as subject to be called upon to preach the Gospel at home and abroad as the Apostles. The Priests and Teachers, of the Lesser Priesthood, are also ministers of the Gospel. They are required to labor in the midst of gathered Israel, to teach them concerning the principles of life, to see that there is no iniquity in the Church, and that all the members of the Church do their duty.

The Latter-day Saints are expected to be a peculiar people, because of their lives and examples; and they are expected to preach the Gospel by example, if they are not always called upon to preach by precept. Every person who has named the name of Jesus Christ should feel the vital importance of preaching the Gospel by example, and it will have much more effect, it will be much more telling, than anything that can be said; for if we be all preachers of the Gospel and theorize beautifully, and yet are not workers and devoted followers of the Savior, our preaching will be in vain. The strength of the testimony of our President, and of his Counselors and the Elders who stand up from time to time to preach the Gospel, is in the presence of the Holy Ghost and by its power, and that is only enjoyed in answer to our devotion and to their correct lives.

Latter-day Saints should be peculiar because of their temperance. They should be peculiar because of their prayerfulness. They should be remarkable because of their obedience to the requirements of the Lord; and there is an opportunity just before us now to emphasize our obedience and our willingness to answer to the requirements of the Lord, and that is in building the Salt Lake Temple—the greatest temple that has been built in this generation, and one that has become world-renowned. There is perhaps not a building in the world today that excited greater curiosity in the minds of the people of the world than does this Temple standing upon this block. Last April, when it was decided by the people to put forth all the effort and means necessary to complete that Temple by the 6th of April next, it was thought that it could be completed with about one hundred thousand dollars, or a little more; but that action was taken by the Conference without previously obtaining correct estimates in regard to the amount that was necessary for its completion, and instead of requiring one hundred thousand dollars to finish the work, it has been found to require about three hundred thousand dollars. It will take a stupendous effort upon the part of the Latter-day Saints to finish that work and have it so that it may be dedicated without any indebtedness hanging over it. No doubt the Latter-day Saints are able to do it if they are determined in their own minds what each person ought to give for that purpose, and what each can afford to give. I am impressed that Israel will have to make apparently a little sacrifice in order to accomplish that work. For it will be very pleasing to President Woodruff, who has been preserved all these years, to participate in the dedication of that building. Every man should take stock of his ability, and then should be generous in judging himself; for if we judge ourselves rightly and perform the part that can justly be required of us, we will not be judged; but we will be judged if we do not judge ourselves in regard to these things. Times are somewhat close in money matters; but I believe, with the good crop that the Lord has blessed the people with this year, that if the farmers, the mechanics and the merchants will only put forth a generous hand, the hands of Bishop Winder will be fortified with means to meet his obligations. I know that the very first week after the April Conference he was in straits for money, and has been measurably so, I presume, ever since, although some has been coming in. We will always feel the blessings of the Lord upon us for the efforts that we make in this direction. Temple building is one of the choicest works that has ever been required of the Saints, and this of all temples that have been built in our generation. It seems to me that it will bring us great credit to have it beautiful and well finished, and then there is the privilege that will be granted to us to go into that house at its dedication. A meeting was held of the Presidency and Apostles a short time ago, and it was decided that the dedicatory services of that Temple should be so conducted that every Latter-day Saint found worthy to go into that Temple should have the privilege of participating in those exercises, and that they should be held from day to day until all Israel shall have a chance to enter into those sacred walls and partake of the spirit and blessing of God that shall attend the dedication of that great building. When we go in there, I believe that we will feel freer in our spirits if we have finished and paid for the building, and every one who steps into that house to participate in the services will feel that he or she has done something towards the accomplishment of that work. But I wonder if there will not be Latter-day Saints who will come up here very anxious (and possibly the foremost of all) to get into that building who have done nothing. It ought not to be. Everyone who has a desire to participate in the dedication of that building, and afterwards in the labors that will be allowed therein for our salvation and for the salvation of our kindred, should feel that he has done something that is worthy of him, according to his ability, for the accomplishment of that important work. I speak of this in the presence of assembled Israel, for I feel that it is necessary. I know that throughout Zion there is a widespread feeling of anxiety to go into that house and to participate in its dedication, and the feeling should be just as widespread—and wider possibly than our ability to come to the dedication—for the completion of that building, that there shall be nothing in the way of its acceptance by the Lord.

Not only should we have this feeling in relation to its completion, but also as to our preparation to go into that house, so that when we go there we will have settled all our quarrels, all our difficulties, all our hardness of heart, bitterness, jealousy and heartburnings, and that we may never do another evil thing in our lives after we have gone through that building. That is the condition the Latter-day Saints ought to be in. Our examples should be just as perfect as they can be in human nature. As I have said, the Latter-day Saints should be remarkable for their temperance; and saloons and gambling houses and everything of that kind should be left to those who are not of our faith. We ought to refrain from everything that is forbidden in the law of God. Then we ought to do everything that the Lord requires of us. We have been a lifetime now in training, in experience, in trial, in preaching the Gospel, and in our labors at home, until the Latter-day Saints today ought to be looked upon by the world as a remarkable people for their fidelity to their faith. We claim to have the only true Gospel—the Gospel that was taught by the Son of God Himself. If this position of ours is correct (and we claim that every man and woman belonging to the Church has a testimony that this is true), what manner of men ought we to be? Ought we to be drinking, gambling, profane, neglecting our prayers? No, indeed. Through all Israel the Latter-day Saints ought to be remarkable to strangers who travel in their midst because of their devotion to the requirements of the Gospel, their faithfulness as husbands, their fidelity and virtue as wives, their devotion and obedience as children. And all the Latter-day Saints being devoted to the cause of God and in their attendance at worship, our houses of worship should be filled constantly on the Sabbath day. The Sabbath day should be regarded as holy in the midst of the Latter-day Saints; that if there were excursion trains to the Lake, pleasure-seeking and pleasure-enjoying in the land of Zion, it could be known that these things were not supported or indulged in by Latter-day Saints. But there is carelessness in this direction. We do not murder, we do not rob, we do not steal; we are not guilty of these grosser things, but we are careless and indifferent in these little things. There is an indifference in regard to the worship of the Lord, in regard to family prayer and in regard to the sacrament on the Sabbath day. A large percentage of the people are thoughtless in regard to these sacred ordinances. It ought to be in our hearts a constant thought and care in preparing ourselves that we can partake of the sacrament, and that we can fellowship together. The First Presidency do this. The Twelve Apostles do this. We fellowship, we meet, we counsel, and we report to each other, and renew our faith and fellowship for one another. We also partake of the sacrament together, as time and opportunity offer, and counsel together for the good of Israel. So it ought to be with all the leading quorums. The Presidents of stakes should meet together; High Councils should meet together, and they should counsel together for the interests of their stakes. Bishops of wards, with their counselors, should meet together in solemn council and consult over the affairs of their wards and the condition of their people, so that they can at any moment report the percentage of faithful and devoted Latter-day Saints in their bishopric. This labor ought to be taken up and followed more faithfully than it has been. Then everything that will tend to the advancement, improvement and encouragement of the people in the wards and in the Stakes should have consideration at the hands of leading men; and if evils exist among the people, such as intemperance, profanity, neglect of the Word of Wisdom or of prayer, and a disregard of the sacrament on the Sabbath day or of the law of tithing, there ought to be energetic, faithful laborers among the people, correcting them, counseling them, so that they may be thoroughly fitted and prepared for the responsibilities that rest upon them. The Lord seems to have understood, in the organization of His Church and the revelation of the Gospel ordinances, that it would take great and careful labor to save the people and to preserve them from the evils of mortality, that do so easily beset them. Hence He has arranged that every faithful man is entitled to the Priesthood. Now, I want to know if an Elder in Israel cannot take care of himself. Is it necessary that a teacher should be on my track? Is it necessary that my president or my neighbor should always be upon my heels to try and keep me sober, honest, virtuous, or from doing wrong? I understand that every man should take care of himself, and should be a savior for himself. I understand that God requires of us to be the workers of righteousness individually. The power is within us. The knowledge and the authority are given to us that enable us to do this. Every man who has attained to the Melchizedek Priesthood should have the strength and power of God to do His will, and to be an upright man, and one that, instead of needing to be taught, is a teacher and an exemplar in the midst of the people. God requires that of you, my brethren, and we will bring to an account sooner or later. I grieve sometimes over my own conduct and weaknesses, when I know that I must account for my folly; and I do repent, and I make reformation, and I am anxious to make all the reformation that is necessary for my salvation; and every Elder in Israel certainly can be as good as I can be. We can do what is right. We can tell the truth. We can be honest, virtuous, just, merciful and forgiving. This is what is required of us. I can set a good example before the people among whom I travel. This is required of me; but I say it is not required of me any more than it is of the deacon. Any man that has had the hands of God's servants upon his head and has received a portion of His Holy Priesthood, is required to be an exemplary man; and an exemplary man is a man who sets good examples, and not bad ones. The Lord has given us the Priesthood for our salvation. It is the power of God, and we ought to exercise it; and then when people of the world come into the borders of the Latter-day Saints, they will find them most exemplary. They may believe they are deluded, simple and foolish, but they will find them consistent in their lives, upright and exemplary in all things. This should be the record of the Latter-day Saints throughout the world. I want to make that record. I know President Woodruff and his Counselors make that record; and these Apostles make that record, and the Seventies, the High Priests and the Elders ought to make it.

That is the kind of men we should be when we go into that Temple. I want to go into the Temple next April. I pray for that, and I am watching and guarding myself, and trying to prepare myself, that when I go in there there shall be nothing faulty in my being or in my spirit; that I shall feel well towards the Latter-day Saints, and that the Latter-day Saints shall feel well towards me. I want your full fellowship, that when you hear that the Apostles have gone into the Temple of the Lord, the faith, the fellowship and the blessing of all Israel will go in there with Brother Lyman, so that there will be nothing in the world to hinder him from enjoying the full flow of the spirit and power of God. And that should be the case with all the brethren—not only the Presidency and the Apostles, but all the quorums, and also all the sisters; that the power of God may be manifested, and that there shall be no division of sentiment, no bitterness of feeling in the hearts of the people, that will check the free flow and presence of the spirit and power of God. Let us remember now for the next six months, and reform wherever it is necessary; purify our bodies and our spirits, and prepare ourselves that there shall be nothing in the way of our going into that sacred house. Not only then should we reform. You know we sometimes take occasion at New Year and other times to make reformation; but I believe it is a suitable time for us to repent every day. Make the reformation that is necessary today, not waiting for any other time or opportunity. When we bow before the Lord morning and evening, we should tell Him all our failings and weaknesses, and ask Him to make us strong and enable us to perform our duties, that we may be acceptable to Him, and that we may obtain all that it is possible for us to obtain in this life. We do not expect to live forever in our present condition; but there are many answers to our prayers that are within our reach if we will but live for them. The sick may be healed, and in many other ways we may be blessed of the Lord in our families, if we have open communication with the Lord. President Woodruff and all the brethren have an altar. Every family should meet together morning and evening around the family altar, and their prayers should ascend to the Lord, and if they are worthy, those prayers are heard. The heavens are always open above such family circles and to such prayers. The Lord is anxious to bless us; in fact, He does bless us, much more, I think, than we are entitled to. I think He advances His blessings and gives them to us on credit very frequently, and we ought to meet Him with our faithfulness and fidelity, so that His blessings may be still increased upon us, until we will be in open communion, by the Spirit of God, with our Father who dwells in heaven, and be so settled and established in the principles of the Gospel that we will be unshaken. Then we will have a power with us that will encircle our children, and that will keep them from gambling, from profanity, from corruption, and that will establish in their hearts the love of the Lord and of His principles—a love of sacred temples and of the holy labors that have to be done therein for the salvation of men. Then we shall be proud of them and pleased with them, and they will bring honor to us; and when we are weak and feeble, tottering toward the grave—when our feet stumble and slip, we shall have some around us that are so firmly established that they can come to our rescue and help us, if we happen to need it.

God bless Israel, that their hearts may be open and free, and their hands ready and willing to accomplish this great work that is just ahead of us and them, that we may be fully prepared to enter into that sacred house, and to do everything else in the future that God requires of us as His Saints, that we may have salvation and exaltation in His celestial kingdom, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

DEATH OF ELIZABETH C. WHITMORE

Elizabeth Carter Whitmore, widow of the late James M. Whitmore, died on the 24th inst. at 6:45 a.m. at her residence, No. 56 south, First West street, of liver complaint, after an illness of four weeks.

Sister Whitmore, daughter of Richard Carter and Elizabeth Lones, was born in Alabama, January 11th, 1827. Her father removed with his family to Texas, and having joined the "Rangers," passed through the perils incident to that condition, and was rewarded by seeing his children prosper under the benign influence of the "Lone Star State."

Sister Elizabeth C. Whitmore was made familiar with the Gospel as proclaimed by Elder Wm. W. Allen, who was filling a mission to Texas in 1856. Conviction fastened itself upon her mind and she proclaimed herself ready to forsake everything she possessed upon earth that she might feel that she was approved of the Lord. It looked, at the time she formed this resolve, as if she would be tried to the uttermost extent, for she immediately met with great opposition.

Nothing daunted she was baptized, and faithfully strove to live what she professed.

Her husband followed her example and they came to this Territory in 1857. In 1861, he being called on a mission to southern Utah, she accompanied him to fill this call from the Lord, and she has proven an efficient aid to the people of that section ever since, for notwithstanding her husband was killed by the Indians in the fall of 1868, Sister W. was equal to every emergency and husbanded with great ability her resources and evinced business qualities seldom excelled.

She has cherished a great desire to see the Temple of this city completed, with the hope of being permitted to enter within its sacred precincts and complete the work she desired to do to unite her, under the everlasting covenant, with her kindred dead.

Being assured two weeks ago by her physician that it was impossible that she could survive many weeks, she, with reluctance, summoned her daughter and four sons to her bedside and informed them that it was important that they assume the cares and responsibilities she had carried, and having urged upon them the necessity there was to devote themselves to the work of the Lord with the strictest fidelity, she surrendered the hold she had upon mortality, and departed, as she had lived, devoted to her God and the best interests of her friends.

THE BEST SHEEP FOR UTAH.

It is hardly possible to overestimate the necessity of securing the very best sheep known in order to surmount the difficulties that every year become more numerous and overwhelming to the wool industry in Utah.

Compare for a moment the cost of handling a flock of sheep ten years ago with that of today. The cost of caring for a flock of 2500 then would be no more than $50 per month; while now it is double that amount or even more. At this rate what may we not look for in the near future? What must be done? The answer presenting itself to me is: Secure sheep that will produce 20 pounds of wool where grew only 5 pounds before, and yet preserve good sized and well shaped bodies.

The care of sheep has claimed my attention for many years, and I am prepared to prove that the French merino fills the bill more perfectly than any other breed known to this Territory. I come to this conclusion after careful examination of the sheep raised in this Territory, as well as the breeds imported from the East, the West, and from Canada.

A month's time spent in California last fall in search of the best sheep only confirmed this view. This is saying a good deal, considering that this coast state has taken greater interest in the science of sheep-breeding than any other in the Union, as is proved by the sheep it has furnished us in the past.

Men located near a meat market may find it to their advantage to breed the coarse-wooled sheep in preference to the fine, owing to the fact that the lambs are larger at a given age; and, when fully matured, are large and well suited for mutton.

Under the head of coarse-wools may be mentioned the Shropshire, Leicestershire, Hampshire, Oxforddowns, Southdowns, Cotswold, Lincoln, and Blackface. Although each possesses distinct peculiarities, the wool is of about the same quality; the fleece not the heaviest and the bodies large, heavy, and of a rounding shape.

Yet among all the Coast ranches very few favor this class, in spite of the fact that railroads are handy and markets not far off. Yet I grant that for strictly market purposes these varieties excel, but, consider for a moment, that only half the increase, the wethers, is marketable; and generally these are not parted with until after the third clipping.

It is safe to say that the French merino will double the fleece of the coarse-wooled varieties named, and that they are equally as valuable for the eastern markets, on account of the great amount of wool they produce during fattening.

My experience with the coarse-wools has been that they shear tolerably good fleeces the first clip or two, but from this on they continually decline. They almost entirely lose their wool on a brushy range, and often get lost themselves, being of a restless, roaming disposition, always looking for the most tender grass. Yet to the credit of these sheep, it must be said, they are good mothers and with less attention will raise more lambs proportionately than the merino flocks.

In the past the price of sheep for mutton has varied not according to the real value, but more according to the experience or inexperience of the sheep men themselves. Inferior wools, previous to the establishment of shipping associations, sold for nearly as much as the better qualities. But the time is fast coming when every wool grower will receive returns for his product according to the scoured pound, and not for its weight as first brought to market. And the mutton buyers will pay prices in proportion to the size, and wool qualities of the animal—the better wool qualities being worth more, as before stated, on account of producing more wool during fattening.

Had the sheep of Utah to be fed or pastured at home, the argument might be brought in for the small merinos that is made for the Jersey cow, that they produce more according to the feed used. Yet I believe even for feeding, that the French merino have the advantage, being larger, and yielding more scoured pounds of choice wool than any other sheep known in our country.

But I would have the reader keep in mind that many of the sheep imported for pure French are but an inferior class when compared with the real stock. Last fall I had the pleasure of witnessing the truth of this.

On the same train on which I had in charge two car-loads of full blooded French merinos, were as many of this inferior class going to Ogden to be sold. Needless to say, the salesman had no success as long as the real stock was in the adjacent corral. The person in charge told me that the lot was trash that the owner had no use for, and had decided to send them to Utah. The information was needless to all who compared them with the genuine stock. Experience has taught me that the French merinos are but adapted for traveling the hundreds of miles from summer to the winter range and return. They will stand more cold, and will rustle their feed in snow where the little, short-legged Spanish merinos sulk and perish.

In buying sheep, get the best and you will never regret it. Money spent for good stock will not only be a source of profit, but will gratify that professional pride which every breeder should have in his flock.

HANMER MAGLEBY.
MONROE, Utah.

Negotiations are pending between Mr. Crawford, an Eastern theatrical manager of long experience, says the Denver News, and the owners of the six lots on Champa street south of the Boston building. Mr. Crawford proposes the erection of a fine theater building to cost $150,000. The obstacle in the way is the figure placed on the lots, over $200,000. Two conservative realty dealers were questioned concerning this. Both stated that in their opinion $200,000 was not too much for the property, but that the owners, if they did not want the money badly, could well afford to accept a trust deed on the whole, if the purchaser would erect the building, and give liberal time.

THANKSGIVING DAY.

What is the proper method of observing Thanksgiving day? If the majority of the press are to be received as a criterion, the answer is plain: Eating turkey in particular and gormandizing in general, while making of the occasion one of hilarity and freedom from restraint. When the newspapers are unanimous on any subject, or nearly so, they are very apt to be right; but luckily we (advisedly) do not agree on the one spoken of. The DESERET NEWS emphatically dissents from the majority and holds the plan of recognition above outlined as exactly the reverse of what should be the case. The day is singled out from the calendar by executive authority as one to be devoted to praise and thanks to the Giver of all good for His mercies and blessings; public assemblages of a strictly religious character are sometimes held before the eating begins, and the food should always be blessed before it is partaken of. There is no necessity for a display of Puritanism or longfacesness, but hilarity of the hysterical kind and the drinking of liquors, the doing of anything, in fact, except in moderate, should be strictly frowned down.

This is the proper mode. It is not expected that everybody will observe the plan, if indeed more than a very few, outside of those who render thanks and experience grateful feelings every day of their lives, shall do so. The Latter-day Saints, as a rule, will follow their unvarying custom of expressing their gratitude for blessings conferred orally and with so much of ceremony as the circumstances require or admit of. They may not invariably adopt the recommendations made to assemble in their places of worship and make public acknowledgment of the common Father's goodness to His children, but they will be none the less sincere in praising His name and enjoining upon their families to feel as well as express thankfulness and praise.

The custom has come down to us directly from the Puritan fathers who settled New England, though history shows that it was a practice in the land from whence they came—old England—a long time before they left there. The day was invariably observed by them in the manner we have herein advocated, and that they had cause for thanks as well as supplications at all times, we all know full well; that we have so much more cause than they is apparent to us on every hand. Then let not the grand object be overlooked; feasting and merry-making should not be the main objects, but where engaged in they should be in moderation and figure merely as incidents of the day.

THE BRUSSELS CONFERENCE.

One of the most consequential gatherings of recent times is that which began its session in Brussels today. Certainly it has one of the most momentous and far-reaching questions to deal with that ever occupied the attention of any international body; and we are justified from its personnel in saying that the subject which brought it together will not be slighted. No other nation is directly affected to the same extent that the United States is, and therefore we on this side look to the outcome of the conference's work with an interest which amounts to very much more than we could take in the mere disposal of a question in natural philosophy.

This country has become such a great producer of silver that its absorption in the channels of commerce has become a matter of the gravest concern. Can a nation have too much money? Of what should that money be composed? If of more than one metal, what metals shall be employed and what the ratio? These are the questions with which the representatives of the powers at Brussels will have to deal, and we look for them to definitely determine each and all of them, so that they may be removed from the field of controversy and all may know exactly what to rely upon. To be entirely satisfactory on this side of the Atlantic, the categorical answers to these questions will be:

1.—No, so long as it is universally recognized as money; for then the more a country has the greater its power among the nations of the earth.

2.—Of royal metals possessing the qualities of immutability, indestructibility, incorruptibility, malleability and ductility, being not so scarce as to limit the circulation to a few, and thus create contraction of currency, nor so abundant as to be common in the hands of everybody, thus creating inflation and curtailing the purchasing power of the money. Gold and silver, and nothing else, answer these requirements, and therefore the answer to question 3 is partly contained herein. The ratio is what the conference must determine, having first in view the apparent supply and relative quantities of either, mined and unmined but likely to be obtained. The relative values is an astruse proposition, but it can be determined upon a practical basis. The law of supply and demand can have but little to do with it, as the decision of the conference will settle that feature of the case, and they are dealing with a matter which is an adjunct to, not a subject of, the law spoken of. The decision must be with due reference to the qualities named and the respective quantities visible and invisible, immediately and prospectively; then, when a ratio shall have been adopted, providing that one ounce of gold shall be equal to so many ounces of silver and in that proportion both metals shall circulate freely as money among all the signatory powers, the difficulty which has environed us so long will end at once. The miner with a quantity of silver will know exactly what his possessions are, and will no longer be in the position of the huckster with a wagon load of truck going to market.

It will establish stability in the mercantile affairs of the civilized world such as it has not known before, and will be the means of ushering in at once upon us of the West such a steady tide of prosperity as we have longed for, struggled for, asked for, but never realized. It will be to us just the difference between dealing in certainties and uncertainties, and surely everybody of mature years who has ever had any dealings at all can appreciate without argument or further example what a vast difference that is. Above and beyond all things else, it means justice to a noble metal through securing justice to the hardy and venturesome men who go in quest of and secure it.

A propitious and speedy outcome to the labors of the Brussels conference, say we all!

A QUESTION OF AIR.

He who resides on the upper benches to the north and east of the city, or on the lower level some distance out on the south and west, will have noticed in the early morning before the sun has risen or at evening when the glorious orb of day is about to set, a peculiar atmospheric condition demanding more than passing attention. We refer to the dark, dense, impenetrable cloud of smoke that overhangs the business portion of the city like a great, black pall, seeming to rest upon the roofs of the higher buildings, and descending, unless sooner wafted away by the wind or dispelled by the sun's rays, in a sooty mist into the very streets.

As an evidence of industrial and mechanical activity, this product of our mills, foundries, factories, electric light works and power houses is most gratifying to every resident desirous of the city's prosperity. Not in that aspect of the case do we take the stand of objector; neither is it our purpose to boom suburban real estate as desirable for residence property through pointing out the grim disadvantages of that which is "close in."

None of these. The intention at this time is merely to say that the matter of smoke consumption, other than through the nostrils and lungs of the citizens, is one that will soon be calling for earnest municipal consideration.

A NATIONAL WEAKNESS.

A picture of the speed at which Americans go through life is drawn in vivid colors by a recent English writer, who has thus won for himself, from the critics in his own land at least, a great reputation for cleverness. He says the American business man bolts a breakfast which might satisfy a California miner, and then rushes off to catch the sky train; he tells all day in the service of Mammon, snatching a quick luncheon at the bar counter, he deluges himself at dinner with feed water, and then retires to the drinking saloon to refresh himself with cocktails; he incessantly chews and smokes the strongest tobacco, and he is finally taken to the cemetery at a smart trot, in consideration for the mourners, whose time is money.

Americans are not to be blamed for failing to see "cleverness" in the writer of such stuff as this, for everyone knows it is utterly false in all its particulars and only partially true in a few instances. To his credit be it said, the American business man who succeeds feels that he would rather wear out than rust out, and he esteems as one of the minor pleasures of life—not the chief end of existence—the act of eating. At the same time, there is no doubt that amendment in some of the American ways of living could be introduced with profit. The span of life would be lengthened, its joys would be enhanced, if instead of running the machine always at a high pressure, calculation were made on keeping a certain reserve energy to be brought forth only in emergency. The instances of premature decay, the spectacle of men too ought to be still in their prime fagged out and unfit for mental and physical usefulness, would be rarer if to the divine command of one day's rest in seven were also added the sound, common-sense, mechanical rule that there is danger in ceaselessly operating even the most perfect machine at the highest limit of its capacity. Temperance and moderation are as much the duty of the citizen who cares for his own and his posterity's welfare, as though they were blazoned upon the statute books and enforced through judicial penalties.

CONCERNING THE COMET.

At the present time there is dimly discernible in the northern sky a tenuous-looking will-o'-the-wisp, and men who have devoted their lives to and make a business of explorations of the upper deep hold nightly interviews with the little wanderer, that is, when the view is unobstructed. The comet—for such in one form or another it undoubtedly is—does not seem disposed to cultivate neighborly relations with our planet, although one or two of the knowing ones have expressed the opinion that the orbits of the two may intersect at a point not set down on the map. This is largely speculation of the baseless sort, a natural product of minds which are constantly bent upon the things that be far away and which, therefore, are impressionable by dreams and airy equations more than by the more fleshly and solid things of this groveling existence.

Even if the earth were to pass through the phosphorescent train of a comet, it would be a circumstance altogether unappreciable to us. In fact, our astronomical instructors advise us that this very thing was done a few years ago, in the case of the magnificent comet of 1862, we believe. The tenuity of a comet's caudal appendage is so great that it does not enter the domain of substantial things at all, but is rather of the nature of a translucent haze. Stars are nearly as easily seen through it as when it is not in the way, this of course referring to the more remote portion of it, for the density increases as the head of the comet is approached, and this itself is undoubtedly a more or less solid mass; if this were to collide with the earth it might shake us up considerably, especially when we consider that all comets move along at a rate dozens and it may be hundreds of times as fast as our comparatively snail-paced earth does—and yet we lose the time, if the matter of 68,000 miles an hour is to be taken into consideration! However, it is to be hoped that no one will abandon himself to gloomy apprehensions over such a result, for it is not likely to occur.

The word comet is from the Greek comē, meaning hair; planets is from the same tongue and means wanderer. Both appellations are singularly inappropriate and illustrate again how prone is the uncultured mind to attach appearances and meanings to things in accordance with its own limited scope. There is nothing remotely resembling hair about a comet, and the planets are not in any sense wanderers, pursuing, as they do, paths about the center of our system with an unvarying regularity which no mechanism can approach; year after year, age after age and cycle after cycle has it been with them a steady, unswerving course in their mighty sweep through space; yet so nicely are the laws of force from within and without applied that no deflection occurs; indeed, a variance in one of their paths by so much as the curve sometimes imparted to the flight of a baseball might produce a perturbation throughout the entire solar system! There is not much that resembles a "wanderer" in this, surely; but the comet is that and nothing else. But three or four comets are known to have fixed orbits, and only two or three of these are ever seen twice by the same generation, their orbits are so extremely elongated. It is held that there are as many of the other kind as there are fishes in the sea and their deportment in space must be the very non plus ultra of celestial eccentricity. They meander around until our sun by his own movement through the ethereal depths, or that of the comet, and perhaps both, bring the latter within his influence, and then it makes a plunge almost directly for his blazing breast. We may not see it until it has been on the way for weeks at the rate of several thousand miles a minute, and may not see it at all, depending upon its magnitude and our relative positions. It flies to its nearest approach to the sun, its speed constantly increasing, and when it gets as near as is consistent with its flank movement at the right time, it darts past and nearly around the burning zone, thence disappearing as rapidly as it came and being lost to the view of man forever. Why is it that the power which seemingly draws it toward itself becomes apparently all at once a repelling one and that which threatened to plunge into the furnace is kept at a proper distance and sent back to the depths of the shoreless sea from whence it came? As a scientific question, no astronomer or other person can answer with any degree of satisfaction, nor can any of them give us even more than a theory of what comets are, why they are or by what they are controlled; by the aid of the prism and spectroscope we know some of their component parts and that is all we do know. And yet some of them have approached so near the sun that anything metallic contained in them would have melted as rapidly as a snowball in a blazing fire.

Comets are mysterious visitors, and the comparative frequency of their coming instead of diminishing the interest in them which we all feel does but increase it. Whether we shall ever know more of them than now is merely a guess, but it may be received as a certainty that every time one approaches, a hundred telescopes manned by as many skilled and experienced sky voyagers will be trained upon it, all intent upon adding whatever they may to the fund of information now possessed; meantime, theories constructed out of logical premises, beliefs and even well-worded apophthegms to the comet are strictly in order.

THE PANAMA CANAL SCANDAL.

When France has no governmental crisis on hand, she generally manages to improvise a huge scandal or something equally penetrating to get along with for the time being. She has not had a ministerial overturning for a few years, but the variety and number of the other commodity have led the record somewhat, and this in France means a great deal. The latest thing in the shape of a full-grown, well-developed scandal are the facts coming to light regarding the manner in which money was raised for the Panama canal scheme, as well as what was done with it after it was raised.

It looks as if legislators were much the same in all ages and in all countries. There is sure to be one here and there whose vote and influence are for sale, and the price demanded and received usually corresponds with the extent to which he can cause others to do as he engages to do. Uncle Sam has had several such skeletons in his closet, but only occasionally have the dark public been favored with a view of them, except during the period immediately following the war, when they became so common that no one on the outside seemed to mind them much, and the details of the Credit mobilier by which the government was swindled out of a few score millions; the De Golyer contracts; the Pacific Mail subsidy (this resembling the present French mudic more than any other); the systematic traffic in post trade ships, and many others, not forgetting the later Star route transactions, got to be read as so much news and nothing more.

There is no telling at present what will come of the developments ament the Isthmian canal, but in the chamber of deputies yesterday M. de la Haye created a most profound sensation and not a little tumult by showing that money had been raised for the purpose of buying votes in that body, the one who solicited the funds declaring that the modest sum of 5,000,000 francs, or about one million dollars, was all that was wanted to purchase the needed consciences in either house of the national legislature. This, if true, goes to show that the average French statesman is much cheaper than his trans-Atlantic brother, for the Pacific Mail company at the time referred to went into the open market several times with more than that in each pocket, all to be placed where it would do the most good. Why, one member of Congress, Joel Shoomaker by name, representing a New York City district, was found by investigation to have received $175,000 at one time, which the evidence went to show was his retaining fee as an attorney! The committee wanted to ask him a few questions, but his physician had just previously discovered that the statesman's health was impaired and had advised a trip to Europe, which advice had been heeded! As there were several high-priced attorneys engaged for the honorable and high-minded purpose of conveying special privileges in the shape of monstrous subsidies and otherwise from the government they were paid to make laws for and whose interests they were supposed to protect, our Gallic friends can congratulate themselves upon having escaped so easily. A million dollars is about what the average corporation would start out to buy a state legislature when it couldn't get within gunshot of Congress with such a paltry sum.

It is gratifying to know that on this side of the Atlantic the kind of business referred to has not been so observable of late; in fact it is questionable if there has been any such going on. Undoubtedly every gathering has its purchasable commodities, but these are bought stingily and secretly, and the transactions of the kind do not assume the proportions of former years when things were more unostentatious. France is welcome to all such developments; though the consternation and indignation which the unearthing of the Panama business has provoked would seem to indicate that they have no more use for that class of men there than we have here, and that somebody will have to answer for what has been done.

THE SCHOOL ELECTION.

The News would have its readers recall and retain prominently in mind the election of school trustees for the several municipal wards of Salt Lake City, which is to take place on the 7th of next month—two weeks from today. There is still ample time to remind the voters of the importance of their duty on the occasion, but it is none too soon to begin the consideration of names to adorn the ticket which will be placed in the voters' hands.

With the details as to the manner of conducting the election we need not now concern ourselves; suffice it to say, each ward will be permitted to name one member of the next school board, and it devolves upon the leading spirits in the different precincts to see to it that the very best available man be nominated. If this be done, regardless of political distinctions, we have confidence enough in the sense and honor of the community to predict that such selections will be approved by the suffrages of the people. For once, partisanship and bigotry should be submerged by all classes; in a cause so sacred as that of the education of the young, nobler motives and aims should have the place. The duties of school trustees require ability of a high and peculiar character; the responsibilities of the position are numerous and weighty; and every citizen ought to be interested in securing for the office men in whom all have confidence and whose name and record are a guarantee of fitness and integrity.

Believing in giving honor to whom it is due, the News takes this opportunity to commend the labors of the present board. They have expended large sums of money, larger in fact than some have approved of, but none of it has clung to their fingers or been unworthily diverted to favorites. As a body they have been earnest and zealous, and the works they leave behind them will constitute their enduring monument. They deserve this much praise at the hands of the community, and we trust to be able to say as much, and if possible more, for the new board which shall be chosen as their successors.

A MODERN AFFAIR OF HONOR.

Duelling in all its aspects receives and deserves the unequivocal condemnation of all the law-abiding elements of every civilized community; hence anything that comes to public notice as an alteration or revision of any of the points of the code, is usually dignified with no higher commendation than attends the timid clipping of a huge evil that should be cut out bodily. Still, we note with some pleasure an innovation brought to view in Chicago lately, and meriting a considerable degree of approval. It appears from one of the journals of the enterprising World's Fair city that a gentleman, bent upon getting satisfaction for a real or fancied insult, challenged another gentleman to an encounter with deadly weapons. The gentleman challenged, following a well-authorized precedent, accepted and chose the weapons. He chose a warrant of arrest and a policeman. Then he arranged for an immediate meeting, not in the cold, faint gray of dawn, but in a magistrate's office. The result was most pleasing. The challenger was severely lectured by the justice and the challenged obsequiously fired in the air—that is to say, refused to prosecute.

This precedent, with the exception of the lenity of the magistrate, can be heartily commended to all devotees of the code duello in this and every other country. The principals ought to derive quite as much satisfaction from it as from popping at each other with pistols, thus endangering the lives of the bystanders, and it goes without saying that the public will be vastly better pleased. The suggestion may not be inopportune, therefore, that the course for a challenged party to pursue hereafter is clearly marked out; instead of making his will, bidding his loved ones a tearful goodbye, and selecting the revolver or rapier as the weapon, let him accept the cartel with joyful alacrity and plug up the patrol wagon.

The city and county have brought seven actions for an aggregate of $2093 against Wong Woo Ching Sing, the scurriel of Ah Him, who was arraigned for gambling but jumped his bail in San Francisco recently.

PEARY TO TRY IT AGAIN.

The government refusing to assist Lieutenant Peary in another effort to reach the Polar region, he now proposes to go as a private citizen. To this end he will resign his commission, and obtain supplies and equipment from other than government sources. While he is about it, why not prepare a relief expedition to be in readiness for sailing a month or so after he sets sail? This has become an inevitable adjunct to all these Polar expeditions, and it might as well be provided first as last, it would seem. It is also to be hoped that he will amply stock the provision department and not trust too much to what he can find in the frozen zone, so that such disagreeable details as have come to us from up there as a man being shot for stealing a little food when he was starving to death, will not have to be recorded of ex-Lieutenant Peary. He already has one "mysteriously disappeared" man to his credit, and should be admonished, if he is not already aware of the fact, that a crime per se is no less a crime because committed where there are no laws of man's making to control the wayward.

A FALSE REPORT.

The news reports advised us not long ago that at an interview between President-elect Cleveland and some of the Tammany chiefs, he was asked for a distinct pledge of recognition of that society as soon as he took the reins of authority; to this he replied (as we were informed) in a most emphatic manner, refusing to do anything of the kind and punctuating his speech with profanity. This kind of language is so greatly at variance with what we at this distance recognize as Mr. Cleveland's method of expression that it was received with many grains of allowance if not actual disbelief. It requires no ghost from beyond nor any other medium of information to impart the knowledge that a man in the position he is beleaguered with office-seekers and bargain-makers from morning till night and the annoyance at times must be exasperating; but there are very few indeed who know how dignified and genteel the President-elect is that would believe for an instant that any provocation could drive him to the point of "using the big D" or anything of a corresponding nature. So, before discussing the matter, we have waited for further developments.

In addition to the disbelief in Mr. Cleveland's ungentlemanly deportment at the time spoken of, it will not be credited that he ever so committed himself to any man or class of men as to justify them or any one of them in making a demand for pledges upon him. On this point we have the authority of the Brooklyn Eagle, which claims to speak by the card, saying that when he was interviewed after his nomination, by representatives of Tammany Hall who sought to obtain specific promises of patronage in return for support, he utterly and positively refused, saying he would make no promises or anything of the sort to any of them or to or for any others through them; that he had not sought the nomination, which, on the contrary, had sought him; that he considered the success of the ticket in New York a matter of much more importance to them than to him; that he repelled the idea that his Democracy was questionable by them or doubtful by any one; that they knew he was aware who had been his friends before nomination and would know who had and who had not been his friends after election; that he would have no friends to reward on account of friendship, and no former opponents to punish on account of former opposition; that he would go to election or defeat equally free and absolutely uncommitted; but that, if the Democratic people and ticket were beaten in that state by the Democratic machine, another Democratic organization was ready to take its place at once, and that, in such case, the youngest man present would not live years enough to see that machine sufficiently strong to win or betray a cause thereafter, or one of their number ever sitting in a state or national convention again.

"This," says the Boston Herald (Independent), "is exactly the Grover Cleveland whom we have known." It is certainly more like the ideal which the majority of the people hereabout who have not met him have created; and having refused to engage himself in entangling alliances with any combination or individual, it was thereafter wholly unnecessary (even if such a thing is ever necessary) to use explosive language characteristic of the saloon lounge and corner loafer. It is entirely likely that that report is but the forerunner of many other similar ones; Mr. Cleveland is understood to have a very inattentive ear and a remarkably cold shoulder for the genus office-seeker, and these will be likely to exercise their capability in the matter of invention to the utmost. Those who are deceived thereby are not wise.

THE STAR CHAMBER.

"Star chamber" proceedings are sometimes indulged in by our high-priced local government, as when the Mayor investigates an official against whom charges have been lodged and excludes reporters and spectators from the proceedings; also when the City Council gets in a mood showing lack of confidence in the public and shuts itself up behind locked doors. Everybody doesn't know the origin of the term at the beginning of this article, but as they are likely to become quite familiar with the practice itself—if they are not already—it can do no harm to supply the information. The court of star chamber is presumed to have derived its name from the room it occupied in the old council chamber of Westminster, England, the roof of which was covered with bright stars.

It has been discovered, however, that there are other derivations, the most plausible seeming to be the one given by Blackstone. Before the banishment of the Jews under Edward I their contracts and obligations were denominated in the ancient records stars or starns, from a corruption of the Hebrew word shefar, a covenant. These starns, by an ordinance of Richard I, were commanded to be deposited under three keys in certain places, one and the most considerable of which was in the king's exchequer at Westminster. The room at the exchequer where the chest containing these starns was kept was probably called the starn chamber, and, when the Jews were expelled the kingdom, was applied to the use of the king's council, sitting in their judicial capacity.

Star chamber proceedings mean, in a general sense, any secret doings of a public body, but particularly where charges are disposed of.

JUDGE FIELD TO RETIRE.

Associate Justice Field, of the United States Supreme court, is about to retire from that body, though political considerations may induce him to withhold his resignation until after President Cleveland is inaugurated. Mr. Field is a Democrat, and as there are but two others out of the nine members, it may be deemed only fair that one of that political persuasion succeed him, though such inducements are not presumed to weigh with the "grave and reverend signora." Mr. Field enjoys the distinction of being the only surviving member of that bench who was appointed by President Lincoln; he has served with four Chief Justices—Tacey, Chase, Waite and Fuller—his period of service being thirty years nearly, prior to which he was on the bench for five years in California. But six American jurists have a record equal to his—Chief Justice Marshall, thirty-four years; Justice Washington, thirty-one; Justice Johnson, thirty; Justices Story and Wayne, thirty-three each; and Justice McLean, thirty-two.

THE SHORT-WEIGHT DEALERS.

A coal dealer of this city has had displayed in front of his place of business a placard reading—"1800 pounds of screened coal and 2000 pounds of unscreened coal for a ton." Anti-slivermen in the East declare that the government has issued an 88-cent silver dollar to keep company with the fuel measure or 100-cent gold dollar, and some even go so far—or so short—as to put it down to 69 cents, thus pointing out what an utter fraud it is to foist upon the people anything in the name of a dollar that does not answer the dictionary requirement of containing 100 cents. And so it would be a fraud if it were true, but the government has done nothing of the kind; it has declared, as it has the authority to do, how much gold and how much silver the dollar shall contain, and if one is a fraudulent measure, the other by parity of reasoning can also be so called with just as much propriety. But it was of coal we began speaking.

A ton, as the term is used in this country, is 2000 pounds of anything. More than that is more than a ton and less is but a fraction of a ton. If a man sells a ton of coal or anything else and gives but 1800 pounds, his measure is 200 pounds short, and, unless he reduces his prices to correspond with the shortness, he simply robs his customer out of so much money as is represented by the shortage, that is, one-tenth of the whole sum paid. This is a trifling matter, some one may say; fifty cents or even seventy-five in a deal is not worth haggling over. Is it not? If not worth consideration, if not of sufficient importance to figure on, why does the dealer take it? He evidently thinks otherwise, or he would not commit the sin (to put it very mildly) of selling a man one thing and giving him another of less value. "Oh, but that is different," the superlatively charitable and excessively careless may say; "it amounts to something to the dealer, because small amounts in the way of profits are the same to him as to a storekeeper; aggregated they make his living." Just so; the small profits are what all our enterprises, great and otherwise, depend upon. But whenever we find one depending upon his small thefts for a living, it is time to jump on it with both feet and the hardest kind of shoes. Going out, the dishonesty spoken of does not seem to figure so highly, because it is distributed throughout the community and the amount which each has to pay is not so great as to in-flict to serious trouble; but coming in, it represents in the aggregate large sums every day, being just so much added illegitimately to a business that has not even the poor excuse of doing badly in a financial way to offer in justification.

It will probably be claimed that the new arrangement (1800 pounds for a ton), being duly advertised, the customer is not taken advantage of in any way, since he is made fully aware, before purchasing, of just what he is getting, and if he takes the goods at the figures demanded he implicitly if not actually consents to the deal and thus does as much toward making the bargain on the terms proposed as does the one from whom he buys. This would be an excellent argument for the defense in a criminal action founded upon such a case as is spoken of if the circumstances all around were normal; but they are not. Those who engage in the business of retailing coal in this city have a monopoly compared with which we have to go back to the days when there was but one telegraph wire, or later, one railway line across the continent and we could patronize it or any other method we chose. It will be observed that we thus had our choice even then. The coal men not being on a footing with other merchants because of the railroads being willing to haul goods for the latter on competitive terms, have the game entire in their own hands. If one dealer's terms do not suit you, you can go to another; any of them will tell you that. But why waste time in going there only to be confronted by the other Dromio—to receive the same greeting, same terms, same treatment? You must have the coal, and so far as the outcome generally is concerned, might as well close a transaction with the first one you come to as the last. Certainly, the fact that the terms upon which you deal with the seller were imparted to you beforehand disarms any charge of unfairness you might be disposed to make and having assented you have no right to complain. Is this not logical, reasonable, comforting and conclusive?

It is proper at all times to be just, and right here let us be just to the railroads. They have placed us within the constricting folds of a pulseless monopoly, and we can submit to its embrace or go cold; but in the midst of all this, we believe they unload 2000 pounds for a ton and if they do not they can be reached by legal process. So far as heard from they have not yet attempted a revision of the standard arithmetic by making anything less than 2000 pounds a ton, and no one in any age or at any place overknew them to try to make it any more than that. Those who deal with them and then with us, however, are more venturesome, or enterprising if they prefer that word. Through their mutual relations the profits to both are so enormous that there is not the slightest excuse for adding anything in the way spoken of, but yet it is done right along. It has been done all the time and finally the press make the situation so warm at our enlarged guardians at the City Hall are compelled to pay attention, and then comes the announcement that, if you want something that will burn all the way through you must take ten per cent less than what you pay for! What an improvement! What an honorable addition to profits which previously amounted almost to petty larceny!

The heaven is working at last; that is some comfort. The absence of competition is a condition in which we hope never to be found again after this year is gone. We look forward to a time in the immediate future when fairness will characterize the traffic in fuel the same as it does other branches of business in our midst; and when that time comes the citizens will pay not to exceed three dollars for a full, honest ton of coal unmixed with dirt or other substance that is not combustible. Then those who cannot or will not deal fairly with consumers will certainly not advertise the fact; indeed, they will not be likely to have anything to advertise long.

UNPOPULAR STATESMEN.

The one statesman of England who is hated more cordially by native Irishmen and looked upon with less favor by home rulers than any other, is the former home secretary for Ireland, A. J. Balfour. This feeling has been at times so intense that his appearance in any place where there were considerable numbers of Milesians was enough to precipitate a riot. He has a method of taking up and dispatching business that is so severely systematic and characterized by so much of sans froid and smiling persistence, that his opponents must often be well nigh exasperated, and it is no wonder that he was charged with having corrupted the voters who elected him to parliament recently; but the charge seems, says the Boston Herald, to have been an exceedingly attenuated one. It chiefly rested on the evidence of a barber, who swore that he had been entrusted with a large number of tickets for drink to be given away to Mr. Balfour's supporters. He affirmed that he had a large batch of unneeded tickets in his house, and undertook to place them at the disposal of the petitioner for the purpose of action. Unfortunately, on the eve of the performance of this promise burglars broke into the barber shop, carried off the box, and the damning proofs disappeared. The story looks like what we call a campaign lie in this country.

Mr. Balfour is looked upon by his political and personal enemies in England very much as Henry Cabot Lodge or Thomas B. Reed was by the Democrats of this country a year or so ago. Strong men in any country, and on any question, are likely to arouse strong antagonism. Sometimes they live it down, and sometimes they do not; it all depends on their own nerve, pertinacity and the degree of innate right or wrong by which they were influenced when they created the opposition which made them so unpopular.

THE UTAH ELECTION.

A number of the eastern papers have indulged in bitter and unwarranted slings at Utah since the recent election; probably for the reason that the political aftermath is never so interesting but what an occasional editorial shot may be spared for this much-advertised portion of the national commonwealth. The Boston press has been as unkind in this regard as any of them; we note, however, that in some instances there is a willingness to listen to a statement from the other side. The Transcript, for instance, recently gave a prominent place to the following from Mr. Charles Ellis of this city, dated November 11:

There were three candidates in the field for the dealership in Congress. They were the representatives of the Democratic, the Republican and the old "Liberal" parties. The Democrat is elected. The contest was really only between the latter and the Republican candidate. It was an exciting contest. The Republican candidate was a son of Hon. George J. Cannon, first elected to the President of the Mormon Church, and many people believed that the church leaders were using their influence to have the Republican candidate elected. The contest, therefore, was to be a demonstration of the good faith of the Mormon people and their leaders when they declared a year and a half ago that the Church was out of politics.

The election of the Democrat, who is of Mormon parentage but an agnostic in faith, shows that the Mormon people were sincere in declaring that henceforth they should stand with their political party (without reference to their religion). Mr. Cannon was a powerful pleader for Republicanism, and made great gains for the party. Had the people been under the direction of the Church leaders in their politics, Mr. Cannon would have been elected. That he was defeated by his own brethren is good evidence that the Mormons will vote as they please. While I admire Mr. Cannon for his ability, I am glad he was not elected. Had he been the country at large would have said that it was the work of his Church, and the division of the people on party lines would have been declared a "trick." As it is, there is no possible room for such an opinion.

I have said and written much in regard to that division, and at all times have declared that the Mormon people were honest and sincere in giving up their old party. This election confirms my judgment and increases my regard for the people. It is now only a question of time when the Mormon people as a whole will become thoroughly familiar with American politics and will be found working as intelligently on national questions as any class of people in the country. There is nothing now in the way of giving Utah statehood and thus encourage the people in the work they have so well begun. Utah will make a great state, and now is the time for Eastern men to come here and invest.

AS TO SCHOOL TRUSTEES.

One of our contemporaries asks if it would not be a good idea for the press to unite in asking for the renomination of the retiring members of the school board and thus secure their re-election without opposition. The suggestion is not a bad one; with the return of the five gentlemen whose terms are about to expire the NEWS believes the majority of the citizens would be well satisfied and the interest of the state's public schools well served. They have made an excellent record and have given abundant evidence of capacity and zeal no one will dispute; and it would be a graceful token of appreciation and gratitude to continue them in office by acclamation.

But the gentlemen themselves may not be willing to accept another term, even though it were unanimously tendered them. Before the honor is thrust upon them would it not be well to hear from them on the subject? And, what is equally important, would it not also be well to wait until the constituents of each one pass upon the matter? For itself, the NEWS is ready to endorse the renomination of them all; but it submits that such action would be premature until the voters of the respective precincts have signified their wishes in the premises. The gentlemen whose terms expire are: Mr. Henry T. Duke, from the first municipal ward; Col. William Nelson, from the second; Mr. William J. Newman, from the third; Lieut. Richard W. Young, from the fourth; and Mr. John E. Dooly from the fifth. Now, if the qualified voters of these several precincts, assembled in convention or mass meeting without reference to political, religious or any other standing save that of patriotic citizenship, will express their desire for the reelection of these officials, the NEWS will heartily endorse the ticket and will do its part to promote its success.

THE METEORIC SHOWER.

Those who live in the outer portions of the city or where there are no electric or other lights to diminish luminous effects overhead, and were not on the lookout from ten to twelve o'clock Wednesday night, missed a spectacle almost as imposing as the majority of the comets have been. This was what is commonly known as a meteoric shower. The heavens were fairly streaked with the celestial fire-flies, some very faint and others quite glaring in their luminosity, some emitting long trails of bluish phosphorescent light and others perishing where they began. Those who take an interest in astronomical phenomena and this means nearly everybody now, with a comet hurrying around in our solar system—will have fresh matter for discussion in the myriads of "shooting stars" which streaked the cerulean dome on this occasion.

That these flashy visitants were much more remote than those we usually see—many of which nearly reach the earth and a few of which have actually reached us—was quite evident. Not only were they beyond our atmosphere but doubtless greatly so. This display at this time suggests to the reflective mind the question of whence its materials came and what their origin. Are they vagrant fragments from the comet's train drawn toward the earth or some neighboring planet by reason of our great attractiveness? It should be remembered that the cometary wanderer is now pronounced by the astronomers of the day to be nothing but a nebulae haze through the densest parts of which stars can easily be seen; that its motion is not quite apparent, approaching us one day and receding the next; that it is not likely to have a perihelion passage around our sun as other comets have which came within its influence; and all these premises being correct, the conclusion may properly suggest itself that the astronomers were correct a day or so ago when they announced that the visitor was drawing nearer and likely to be quite close on the 28th, and equally correct now in saying it seems to be withdrawing. If the planets of our system are constantly drawing off fragments of its immensity by reason of its approximate nearness, would not the diminution thus created impart to it the appearance of receding into space, even though it might be stationary through opposing attractions, or still headed our way as recently observed? Its final disappearance may be accounted for in the same way, that it has not gone from our field of vision but been completely integrated through the piratical procedure of those among whom it came. We don't present this as a scientific deduction or explanation by any means; it is simply the thought that suggests itself after beholding the beautiful phenomenon, a thought strengthened somewhat by the circumstance that it occurred in an arc of the heavens but a few degrees in width, eighty north of the zenith and surrounded equidistantly the identical point at which the comet now is, or was Wednesday evening.

We are so profoundly ignorant of what comets are composed of and what their errand is not as at any time since scientific investigation began; this being the case the opinion of one man who gives the subject careful and intelligent consideration is as likely to be correct as that of any other person. The same is largely true of meteors, but not so much so of those which enter our atmosphere or reach our earth. The latter are mainly iron in a more or less igneous condition, and may have been fragments of the moon drawn forcibly from her through the powerful magnetic influence of the earth and which, striking our atmosphere with terrific force, are ignited by the concussion; and they may not.

MORE BURGLARIES and still no clues. The only feat of boldness yet unattempted by the marauders is the bodily kidnapping of a policeman; they needn't fear to try it.

A WEIGHTY POLITICAL FACTOR.

One of the material causes that led to the unexpected victory of the Democrats in Illinois has not, we believe, received due recognition. It is true Mr. Wannamaker hinted at it when he dolefully commented that the result of the national election was "a tale of two cities,"—the enormous Democratic vote in New York and Chicago. But even he did not undertake to explain the returns from Chicago came to tell such a tale. We suspect that the World's Fair project had much to do with it.

It is fair to assume that the residents of Chicago, and by this is meant also the vast army of workmen now congregated there, are interested far more in the success of the great exposition to which they have set their hands than in that of any political party this year, next year, or for several years to come. Equally reasonable is the view that the maintenance of the high tariff would be calculated to militate against the success of the Fair so far as foreign exhibitors are concerned. The natural argument with all such would be that since they were in a large measure excluded from participating in American commerce and trade, it would be a waste of time and means to make a display of their products at an American exposition. Is it not probable that an appreciation of this fact caused the World's Fair city to undergo such a wonderful political overturn? No great acuteness of mind is necessary to an understanding of the irony of inviting a foreigner to compete in the display while denying to him the privilege of competing in the market; and the average Chicago mind, keenly alive to the immense monetary gains that must come from the exposition if it is successful, was doubtless ready enough in such a contingency to sink partisanship without a murmur. A London financial paper thinks there is nothing extravagant in the statement that $250,000,000 of foreign money will be left in America as the harvest of the exposition, and "Americans will be literally burdened with money seeking investment." When that sum, or the full amount whatever it is that the Fair will bring, is safely lodged within our borders, the time that the Republican state of Illinois will sing may be pitched in an altogether different key to that just given in this year of grace 1892.

LOOKING BACKWARD.

The courtesy of Mr. W. B. Dougall enables the News to lay before its readers an interesting review of the prices of some of the ordinary household supplies in this city twenty-eight years ago; the source of our information being a copy of the account of a resident of this city with the mercantile firm of Cronyn and Clayton, for the year 1864. The whole statement, which is in the well-known hand-writing of William Clayton, the junior member of the firm, is full of figures which to readers nowadays would appear grotesquely and outrageously high; yet Cronyn and Clayton were known to be as moderate in their prices as any of their competitors and, like the profession then and since, indulged even at that early day in occasional "bargain sales," when goods were sold for "less than cost." There is no doubt that the purchaser in the instance was now refer to felt that the firm's prices were in all regards fair and equitable. With this much of introduction we come to the record.

The first item reads: "To cash, postage on letter to England, 25 cents;" and following this is a charge, "I sett hoops [was this crinoline?], $3.00." In the line of dry goods we quote "fine domestic at 75 cents a yard," "blue drilling at 70," "canton flannel at $1.00," another grade of "domestic" at $1.10, "shirting at 80 cents," "delaine at $1.50," "thread at 80 cents a spool," "braid at 30 cents per knot," "head net for $1.00," and "overshirt for son at $4.50."

In the line of groceries and hardware are: tea at $5.00 and coffee at $1.25 per pound; pepper, raisins and olives were the same price per pound as the coffee, and nutmegs and indigo came at the same figure as the tea; coal oil was $10.00 a gallon, linseed oil and turpentine $12.00 each per gallon, a keg of white lead was charged at $16.00, and nails came at 65 and 70 cents according to size. Soap was 60 cents a pound and rice 50; while gunpowder is quoted at $2.50, and shot at 60 cents per pound, with "water-proof caps" at $1.25 a box; mustard was $2.00, ginger $2.25, cinnamon $2.50 and cloves $3.00 a pound; a pound of rosepot $1.00 and an ordinary cross cut saw is set down at first cost plus freight at $7.84. We conclude with the important and highly interesting item of "100 pounds of sugar, $100," with an additional charge of 75 cents for the sack which contained it.

The foregoing is submitted by way of dessert for the Thanksgiving dinner our readers partook of a couple of days ago and on the remains of which they have doubtless been dining since. A consideration of it and of the changes that have taken place during the twenty-eight years may furnish a text for reflection if not a cause for renewed gratitude.

ENDING A CAREER WITH FAILURE.

The wires convey the information that the Gladstone government is pursuing a policy of masterly inactivity, no bills being ready to present and no settled plan regarding any pressing subject having been adopted. The ministers are constantly at work, but they seem to be acting like so many men in a fog and it is doubtful whether there will be any result to their labors. The dispatch forecasts the early dissolution of the government, and if this should be fulfilled the experiment engaged in by the people of Great Britain in restoring the Liberal party to power will prove a great fiasco.

No matter what the outcome of the present situation, the lesson is once more imparted to the people that greatness does not abide in a name. Great and honorable achievements in the past must stand by themselves, and are in no sense a precursor of assured success in the present, because conditions, situations and the mind of man itself are constantly undergoing change.

To say, therefore, that the Gladstone of twenty or even ten years ago and the Gladstone of today are on an exact equality or any condition approaching it, is to mock at the strides of time and stolidly shut our eyes upon the ravages wrought by progress. All great men have their time of prosperity, which continues until the pinnacle is reached, then the downward course is entered upon and pursued much more rapidly than the upward one. There are no exceptions to this; yet, with the myriad of examples before our eyes, we persist in looking upon the human mechanism as impervious to the friction of years, the mind as having abated none of its vigor or brightness, although the fountain from which its sustenance is drawn is at the very point of exhaustion. How often is it the case that the willing animal is harnessed to his load just once more than he could bear it, and he gives up the unequal contest forever at a time when his driver is subjected to serious embarrassment!

Cardinal Richelieu was for a time the pillar of state to the kingdom of France. He was moulded by nature for such a calling. When he could not prevail by main force, his reserve faculty of cunning was exercised with equal success. He became the dux qua non; and in the stage picture presented, when it seemed as though in his declining years a foul conspiracy against the puerile and weak-minded monarch was likely to prevail, he rallied at the last moment, dragged himself from the jaws of death and crushed the budding treason beneath his feet. This is how we have it presented to us before the footlights, and a more effective dramatic spectacle it would be difficult to devise. In reality, Richelieu, like many others whose public lives have been prolonged into the domain of inactivity if not senility, was too much enamored of his own prowess to surrender it at a time when he could have done so with credit and have thus maintained his great reputation throughout the ages to come; and being no longer able to engage actively in the field of diplomacy, he sought to sustain himself by means of cunning and craft alone. He became unscrupulous, peevish and cruel, and finally went down with his great reputation obscured, his fame sullied and himself despised. It was not for want of judgment, for his was beyond the scope of most men's comprehension; not because of falling intellect, his being abnormally good to the end; but for the reason, that he was vain and inflated with the greatness of his station and the adulation of the courtiers and minions about him—these trophies he would not give up and he prolonged his life's work beyond the time when nature demanded that he cease from trouble or troubling.

There are many similar cases, conspicuous among them being that of Edwin Forrest, the greatest American tragedian and one of the greatest the world ever produced. He mounted to giddy heights and had the world of intellect and culture at his feet. He was lionized everywhere and looked up to by everybody. Cressus seemed to have unlocked his vaults and poured the contents out upon the gifted man. He rose, he reigned, he fell, and fell ignominiously. Decadence sat in, the gout and other destructive agencies laid their deadly clutch upon him, but so vain, so imperious, so unwilling to give up his way had he become that in the face of nature, contrary to reason and against the remonstrances of friends he persisted in dragging his swollen feet upon the stage and making of the heroes whose once breathed and moved and spake through him the most hideous of caricatures. A few friends clung to him, but only a few; it was because of what he had been, not what he had become. Thus broken-hearted and broken-spirited, he ended his career in disgraceful failure.

When men have achieved a full measure of life's usefulness in a particular calling and are thus entitled to honorable retirement, or at least to such abatement of actual toil as will not be utterly inconsistent with their enfeebled condition, to persist in going ahead as actively as when the heyday of full manhood was upon them, is unjust to those who depend upon them as well as themselves. Who can measure the depth of the misfortune that a great cause will be plunged into if, through lack of aggressiveness, determination and vigor the present government of Great Britain shall fall? It will be such a fall as will bury not only the principle for which the Grand Old Man has been so long contending, but himself, his immediate friends and those struggling people across the channel whose hopes and prayers for deliverance from the curse of absolute landlordism seemed so nearly answered. It is impossible for the impartial and cultivated mind to contemplate without admiration the spectacle of Gladstone with his armor on still fighting the good fight, or to cease wondering at the great mental and physical endurance which he is still in possession of. But it must be remembered that he is at the threshold of his eighty-third year, and that he has been active without ceasing for the full period of time allotted to man in this life. The premiership of the oldest civilized and in some respects foremost nation of all the world is one involving the gravest responsibilities and most ceaseless cares. We greatly fear that he is unequal to the task of injecting into a ministry timid through apprehension and distrustful through fear the vigor and energy which alone can rescue the government from impending misfortune if not dissolution. Its failure within a few months was predicted by the knowing ones so soon as the result of the late elections was made known; and it may be taken for granted that those same wisacores, together with all the disappointed and jaundiced politicians, are using no effort to prevent it from going down. It begins to look as if the great premier had undertaken one contest too many.

AGILE KANSAS.

An exchange notes that "One of the new congressmen from Kansas is Charles Curtis, who is one-fourth Indian. He traces his ancestry back to Louis Gouville, a French trader, and the daughter of a Kaw chief, who were married in 1825. With Peffer, Simpson and one or two others the Kansas delegation promises to maintain its high rank for picturesque and unique quality." To this promising list should be added the congressman-at-large, who is an ex-Confederate; this would not be a matter worthy of special mention almost anywhere else, but the idea of a state which enjoys the distinction of being the birth-place of practical abolitionism, the home of John Brown and whose Republican majorities in the days when it had much fewer people occasionally went up to 80,000, sending to Congress by its action as a whole a man who fought to perpetuate slavery! But the incongruous exhibit does not end yet; a woman—Mrs. Lease—is a candidate for the position of United States senator, with anything but a bad chance of success! Then there is John James Ingalls, the wasp-tongued "statesman out of a job," and a country paper in New Mexico, and—but why amplify? Surely Kansas is entitled to the palm as the commonwealth where the unexpected happens oftener than anywhere else under the sun.

SUNDAY TELEGRAPH MESSAGES.

Bradstreet's notes a recent decision by the supreme court of the state of Georgia which amounts to a virtual exemption of telegraph companies from penalties for failure to deliver messages on Sunday. The laws of the state—and it may be mentioned that the code of many others of the states—make it unlawful for any person to pursue his business or the work of his ordinary calling on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and the court holds that this applies to telegraph companies as well as to anybody else. Under the decision, therefore, a telegraph company is not put by law, and cannot put itself by contract, under any duty to transmit and deliver messages on that day unless by reason of the subject matter of the messages in question that transmission and delivery can be fairly considered as a work of necessity or charity; and a failure to perform the work on the Lord's day with reasonable dispatch will not subject the company to the statutory penalty, and an action therefor is not maintainable. The decision is interesting by reason of the large number of damage suits the companies have had to defend for failure to fulfill the contract supposed to be existing when the message was accepted; and it will be more interesting still if the courts in the other states having similar laws shall put a similar construction upon them.

CHICAGO AND ST. LOUIS ENTERPRISE

The workmen and professors are engaged on a monster telescope for Chicago. That city is not happy so long as any other place has anything bigger than it has, and this refers to population, exhibitions, fires, Democratic majority and telescopes as well as to other unmentioned items; and thus the instrument at Lick observatory is to be made second on the world's list instead of first as at present. The contract for the Chicago telescope was let yesterday to Warner & Swasey, of Cleveland, Ohio, who built the one at Mount Hamilton; it is to be finished in a year and will be twenty-five per cent larger than the latter. It will be forty inches in diameter, seventy-five feet long and weigh six tons. That ought to make the moon quite neighborly and will doubtless be the means of settling the case of the next comet that comes within hailing distance after the instrument is in working order.

Speaking of telescopes suggests the working of the idol-smasher again. This time his gulls are trained on the image of Galileo. Here is (or was) the man who was so firm in the conviction that his discovery of mundane rotation was right and must be accepted sooner or later, that his enforced recantation before the Inquisition was given under a sub voce protest, while the petty annoyances to which he was subjected were innumerable. Yet "they are after him," as the following extract from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat shows:

"Most people suppose that Galileo was the first man to advance the theory that the world is a globe and revolves around the sun, but this is an error," said Professor H. P. Scanlan, one of a party discussing Chicago's big telescope in the corridors of the Southern. "More than 600 years before the birth of Christ, Thales of Miletus taught that the world is a globe with five zones. He also explained the lunar eclipses and advanced theories regarding the moon which have been confirmed by scientific investigations during the past century. More than 600 years before the beginning of the Christian era Pythagoras taught those admitted to the esoteric studies that the world was globular in form. Nearly 300 years before the birth of the Babe in Bethlehem Aristarchus of Samos came near losing his life for maintaining that the earth turns upon its axis and revolves about the sun. They didn't have any telescope in those days, but they had a wonderful sight of good horse sense."

The one thing that is more mystifying to the average reader than any other in this connection, is that events of thousands of years ago are so well authenticated and yet have been kept from us with such conspicuous success. Galileo's fame began to spread when the sixteenth century closed and he was quite a young man; it increased with the coming years and became universal as soon as the agents of communication were sufficiently effective to carry it across the waters. There is scarcely a schoolboy of ordinary advancement in this century but knows or knew the great astronomer and what he contributed to the domain of science. For three hundred years Galileo has remained securely upon his pedestal, and now a man in a St. Louis hotel comes to the front with a bludgeon and beats the image to the ground.

NO, SIR.

"A subscriber" writing from Midway, Wasatch county, under date of the 21st, says: "Please answer through the News the following question: Has the United States government in the past few years, or at the present time, appropriated money for a bounty payable to any of the industries in the United States for the purpose of sustaining them—except the sugar industry?"

THE STAR COURSE.

The Theatre was not filled Sunday night, but it contained a large audience, and it is safe to say a more appreciative or better entertained one is seldom seen in that auditorium. Dr. Talmage is a remarkably cool and well equipped speaker. His subject was one that he could treat con amore. His natural love of scientific investigation has fed, as one can see, upon his study of the lives of the Franklins of science.

The doctor proposed to treat his subject in "the orthodox way" and so began with Franklin's ancestry and early life, prefacing his story, however, with a few beautiful sentences, among which were the statements that "Every man is a letter. Every life is a word." On this foundation he made his claim for the uses of biography. He presented many interesting episodes in the early life of Franklin, showing his struggle with a poverty that had come down to him through five generations of Franklins as blacksmiths.

Benjamin Franklin was "set apart" by his parents for the ministry. He began his studies with the delight of a young mind eager to learn. But as the tenth son of the tenth son in five successive generations, he was not in a position to command means to pursue his studies and so consented to be an apprentice to a soap and candle maker. Yet he declared that if that was to be his lot he would make the best soap and candles in the market. Then came his apprenticeship to the printer's art in his brother's office. From there he ran away on account of ill treatment and made his way to Philadelphia. There he gradually rose to eminence as a writer and publisher. In all the agitations among the colonies rising out of the arbitrary acts of the British parliament towards the American colonies, Franklin was ever at the front working for justice to his countrymen. His efforts in England prior to the Revolution were set forth vividly, particularly his protests against the Stamp act of 1765. His efforts in France in behalf of the Americans and his relations to General Lafayette and other eminent Frenchmen, were delineated in a most entertaining manner, and the lecture closed with touching references to the usefulness of Franklin's life and the value of his great example to the young people of today.

The lecture was listened to with the closest attention and even the small boys in the audience caught the story of the great American with unflinching interest.

At the close of the lecture the manager announced that he had just received a telegram from the physician attending Hon. W. H. King, saying that he is seriously ill and unable to fill his engagement. He also stated that he had been asked to have a lecture given on the silver and gold question now being considered in the international conference and that he was trying to secure Judge C. C. Goodwin to give such a lecture. Whether he succeeded or not there would be a good lecture next Sunday night, which would be duly announced.

Miss Maude Pratt at the piano, and the Union Glee club, under direction of Prof. C. J. Thomas, added to the pleasure of the evening.

The audience tendered Dr. Talmage a hearty vote of thanks.

DRAMATIC AND LYRIC.

Under the heading—Dramatic and Lyric—it is the purpose of the News to publish hereafter in its Saturday evening issue, a resume of events theatrical and musical, news of interest in professional and amateur circles, and reviews more or less critical of current dramatic and musical representations in our city. Without doubt the constituency of the theater and the concert hall is steadily and enormously growing, and there is no class of news read more widely today than that relating to the stage and the musical world. To furnish an entertaining and instructive class of information for its readers, to encourage struggling art in whatever form it may be found and to protect the public from the too frequent shams and impostures that masquerade in the guise of art—these will be some of the endeavors of this department. During the week the record of amusements will be fully presented, and public performances will be fairly and impartially criticized. The good will be praised and the bad slated, without regard to the frowns of managers or the exhortations of artists. An honest attraction appreciates honest criticism, even though it may not always come in the shape of praise, and as for dishonest ones how they view the matter no one thinks or cares.

Truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; honest judgment tempered by a kindly spirit—these shall be our mottoes; our duty is to the public, and the public may rely on being informed as to the true merits or demerits of any attraction that asks for its support.

Utah talent is giving a very good account of itself just now. In a recent trip to the east the writer had the pleasure of seeing Maude Adams one of the honorees of the hour in New York, of beholding Edwin M. Royce in the full tide of prosperity in Chicago, of witnessing Ada Dwyer walking away with the handsomest press notices of any one in her company, of seeing Viola Pratt, on five minutes notice, secure the part of leading contralto in a New York church in a contest with thirty or forty competitors, and of seeing Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Young holding responsible places in the Chicago Conservatory and being among the principal features in a Central Music Hall concert. Besides these we ran across our old friend H. S. Goddard, snugly encoined with his wife in a Harlem flat, and diligently studying under Mr. Sweet. Miss Eldredge, another Utah girl, a cousin of Miss Pratt, is in New York studying elocution and the Delarose system. Annie Adams, Salt Lake's leading lady twenty years ago, is in the same company as her daughter, and looking more like her sister than her mother. Lily Snyder is studying under Sweet, and she, Miss Pratt and Mr. Goddard meet frequently in an audacious trio at the latter's home. Fanny Lincoln is at the head of a ladies' quartette in Chicago, and doing extremely well; she and Miss Snyder, it is true, can only be classed with the Utah talent by adoption, but both call Salt Lake home, and Salt Lake is very glad to count them as part of her family.

Maudie Adams is only in her twentieth year, but she has achieved a success not attained by one in a hundred in her profession at that age. Her lines have fallen in specially pleasant places. Engaged by the first of American managers, her seasons are long and profitable, her surroundings are of the highest class, and the star whom she is supporting, John Drew, is a thorough gentleman as well as an inimitable artist. Thus far the kindness of Mr. Frohman has kept Miss Adams and her mother in the same company, and their combined salaries must amount to a very comfortable figure. We saw Miss Adams in "The Mask Ball" one evening at Palmer's; the place had been running six weeks, but the house was packed, and it was easy to see that the Utah girl was a popular favorite. The one scene in the play which has most caused her to be talked about is one where she pretends to be just a trifle tipsy; it was a scene which Mr. Frohman says cost the author, M. Bisson, no end of worry, as he realized that if overdone in the slightest degree, it would descend to vulgarity and ruin the piece. But Miss Adams grappled it and came out triumphant. She goes through the scene in a dainty, graceful way, with only just the faintest suspicion of "leeriness," and it is all immensely pretty and fetching. In all probability the play—which is of rather a light waltzy order and would be almost nil without Mr. Drew and Miss Adams—will be seen in Salt Lake during the season. Miss Adams and her mother live in a tasteful suite of rooms in a private boarding house on Thirty-second street, just east of the Imperial Hotel. They were unaffectedly glad to see their Salt Lake friends, and spoke warmly of the many kindnesses extended them by Salt Lake people. The young lady is now taking lessons on the harp and Mr. Frohman is really in mind a play in which she and her instrument shall be central figures. The rumor published in several papers that Miss Adams was betrothed to her manager was laughingly denied by the young lady, who said she only expected to be wedded to her art.

Mr. Royle's as the husband of the leading lady in "Friends," author of the play, and recipient of a nightly royalty and one of the two principal actors in the company, may be said to be on velvet this season. His wife's salary is a heavy one; his royalty amounts to more than Bronson Howard received for Saratoga, and his own salary for enacting the part of Jack is without doubt a good one. We saw "Friends" at Hooley's theater, Chicago, one night recently, and were greatly struck with the improvements made in it since the Home Club first produced it in this city. It has been shortened, compressed, and made more terse throughout; the ending of the acts has been changed materially, and the best climax in the play where old Otto dies in a fit of delirium tremens got half a dozen recalls. The cast was an admirable one. Miss Fetter (Mrs. Royle) being the central figure. She is a handsome young lady, a very clever actress, and a charming dresser; Mr. Henderson's piano playing is as ever a feature; Mr. Royle plays with much more freedom and abandon than of old, but the palm for vivid, forceful acting is carried off by Mr. Lyons, who as the drunkard Otto, never fails of securing half a dozen calls after his death scene.

Mr. Royle and his wife invited the little party of Salt Lakers in the audience behind the scenes during the evening, and the lady said that she had strong hopes of spending her summer vacation with her husband at his home in Salt Lake.

Ada Dwyer has a very pleasant position in Mr. Pliou's "Across the Potomac" company, which followed "Friends" at Hooley's. The play is a military drama of the "Shenandoah," "Held by the Enemy" order, though it is not the merit of either. Miss Dwyer's part is that of a girl who dresses in boy's clothes to enter the army, and a very handsome boy she makes. The play is doing immense business everywhere, and Miss Dwyer's presence nearly always credits her with having made the special hit of the production. We found her pleasantly lodged at a private boarding house on Wabash avenue, where we had a most pleasant conversation over Utah friends, and the election—Miss Dwyer being an ardent Democrat and beaming with pleasure over the election of Mr. Cleveland.

The more or less friendly rivalry which formerly existed between the Interstate choir and the Salt Lake Choral society, has fairly been revived and heightened during the coming winter. The choral not long ago seemed to be tottering to its fall. The directors saw that heroic measures were necessary, and steps were taken that must either kill or cure it in a very short time. The decision adopted was that every member new and old must submit to an examination to determine whether he or she really had the musical ability to entitle him or her to membership. The result was that the chaff was swept away and the wheat remained. At first the wheat was very limited in quantity, but its quality was first class, and presently the knowledge that there was in the city an organization which had adopted a standard—into which no one could penetrate who had not some musical attainments—drew into it other people—professionals and amateurs—who had held aloof from the original organization for the reason that no barriers existed to keep out inefficient members, and today the choral has nearly 250 active and alert workers, nearly every one of whom is a singer and a reader of music. The society now seems to be firmly established, and as to its capabilities, they will be fully tested by the task which it has undertaken, which is, to present Dudley Buck's cantata "The Light of Asia" during the holidays. The work is a sublime one, full of tender beauties and equally as full of technical difficulties. Very few American societies have yet attempted it and most of them regard it with a species of awe, as something to be assaulted and only conquered after a whole season of arduous application. To those who have read Sir Edwin Arnold's immortal poem, it need only be said that in setting it to music, Dudley Buck caught the same fire that inspired the author; the result is a work which we believe nothing in the past decade of music has transcended—certainly nothing in the same class of musical writing.

The presentation of the Light of Asia has been forced to go over from Christmas to New Year's day and evening, owing to Frohman's comedians having been booked at the Theatre for Christmas, and the notification of the fact from the New York office having miscarried in the mails. New Year's night was originally held for the Home Dramatic club, but business engagements on the part of several of its members prevented their filling it, and it was gladly taken by the choral people.

GLIMPS FROM MANY FOOTLIGHTS.
Jessie Bartlett Davis is getting ready to star.

Frank Daniels is rehearsing a new comedy.

Minna Gale Haynes' season does not open till Dec. 28.

Viola Allen is one of the leading ladies to "Aristocracy."

The beautiful Julia Marlowe is wending her way hither.

Lillian Russell's receipts in Denver were $11,000 for the week.

Robin Hood is delighting New Yorkers at two dollars a head.

Last Monday night saw the 600th performance of "Robin Hood."

Mr. Barber, the wealthy Chicagoan who is backing Gilmore's band, denies that he has disbanded.

The one hundredth presentation of "The Mask Ball" takes place on Christmas.

Young Boucousault and E. J. Henley have been doing "The Shaughraun" in San Francisco.

The gorgeous spectacle "All Baba" opens in San Francisco next Saturday evening.

"Americans Abroad," Sardon's latest play, will be the next venture by the New York Lyceum company.

Willard, the talented English actor, supported by Marie Burroughs, is now at Palmer's, New York.

Marie Winwright is still doing Amy Robson with Eleanor Carey as Elizabeth and Will Ingersoll as Leicester.

Rose and Charles Coghlan's revival of "Diplomacy" has been so successful that they will tour with it through the country.

The first ball of the season at the Theater will be given on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon next. The ushers of the house are the promoters.

"Men and Women" was revived in Philadelphia last week with De Belleville and Mordaunt in their original parts.

Mrs. Bernard Beere's first week in America was a chilling frost, mainly due to the stupid play she chose to introduce herself in.

Alexander Salvini's engagement in San Francisco has been, in point of receipts, one of the most remarkable in the history of the California Theater.

Frohman's Boston Stock company produced Augustus Thomas' "Surrender" last Monday night. Louis Aldrich and Rose Eytinge were in the cast.

Al Hayman and Charles Frohman paid Bronson Howard $20,000 in advance for "Aristocracy." He will probably receive five times that much before the play is shelved.

Lotta, the actress, is said to have improved in health, and at present is considered out of danger. It is not likely, however, that she will again go on the stage—at least, not this season.

Sothorn is now in Brooklyn. He is fast mounting to the place occupied by his distinguished father. He will probably be seen here during next year in both the Dancing Girl and Letterbair.

The separation of Col. Sinn and his wife Cora Tanner was by mutual consent on account of incompatibility. It is refreshing to hear of a separation in theatrical circles with no scandal attached.

Nat Goodwin and Harry Dixey came to words the other night in the Lamba club, and now Goodwin has resigned from the club because the directors did not take his view of the difficulty.

The marriage of Hayden Coffin and Adelaide de Lenox took place at Cincinnati on the 18th. There is nothing startling about this except that there was a young lady with Mr. Coffin at the time of his visit to Salt Lake six weeks ago, and that young lady was freely introduced here as Mrs. Coffin.

The legal fight between Mr. Agnes Daly and Mr. W. A. Brady over the railroad scene in "After Dark," which Mr. Daly claims is taken from his play "Under the Gaslight," is by no means at an end. Mr. Brady says he intends taking it now to the Supreme court.

The dramatic sensation of the hour in New York is Bronson Howard's "Aristocracy." He has been at work on the play for three years. He was called before the curtain on the opening night, a distinction not accorded him at the production of either "Saragoza," "Shenandoah," "The Henrietta" or "The Banker's Daughter."

Commissioners Harry C. Miner, Dr. Thomas C. Robertson and Joel M. Marx have decided that Harry Kernell, the variety actor, is insane, and that unfortunate is now in Bloomingdale Asylum permanently. His wife, Queenie Vasser, will administer his estate, which has rapidly depreciated by reason of her husband's eccentricities.

Charles H. Hoyt, the author of many successful farce-comedies, was elected on Tuesday last to the New Hampshire legislature as a Democrat from Charlestown, being the first member of that political faith from that district since his father served in that capacity several years ago. Mr. Hoyt came to town Wednesday night and made a speech to the audience of the Madison Square Theater, the event being the anniversary of "A Trip to Chinatown." After the performance the actors had a wine supper with Mr. Hoyt.—Mirror.

ORDINANCE REVISION.

There was a special meeting of the City Council on Saturday evening held for the purpose of continuing the third reading of municipal ordinances. Beardsley occupied the chair. The following members responded to roll call: Evans, Folland, Hardy, Helms, Horn, Rich, Simonds and Wantland. President Leofeburov came in later.

THE PROCEEDINGS.

On motion of Hardy section 33 of the chapter on the issuing of licenses was amended so that ticket brokers shall be compelled to pay an annual license of $150 instead of $50, which had been the rule heretofore.

SIDEWALK DISTRICTS.

Section 12, chapter 43, on sidewalks, was amended to read as follows: District No. 19. Both sides of State street, from South Temple to South Capitol avenue.

No. 20. Both sides of all public streets, avenues and alleys in plat A, Salt Lake City survey, not heretofore included in any sidewalk district, except State street from South Temple street north.

No. 21. Both sides of all public streets, avenues and alleys in plat C, Salt Lake City survey.

No. 22. Both sides of all public streets, avenues and alleys in plat B, Salt Lake City survey, not heretofore included in any sidewalk district.

No. 23. Both sides of all public streets, avenues and alleys in plat F, Salt Lake City survey, not heretofore included in any sidewalk district.

No. 24. Both sides of all public streets, avenues and alleys in plat D, Salt Lake City survey.

No. 25. Both sides of First street, from the east line of State street to the east boundary of plat I. Also both sides of Second street and Third street, from east line of Canyon road to east boundary of plat I. Also both sides of Canyon road, from State street to north boundary of plat I.

No. 27. Both sides of all public streets, alleys and avenues in plat E, except State street.

No. 28. Both sides of all public streets, avenues and alleys in plat J.

The subjoined communication from City Health Commissioner Beatty was read and laid on the table until the next regular meeting of the Council:

To the President and Members of the City Council:

I respectfully recommend the passage of the ordinance regulating the construction of privy vaults, herewith submitted. It is a measure of extreme importance, as the privy nuisance has too long been permitted to do its deadly work in this city. It is to be desired that there should be a general adoption of the dry earth closet, which is both inexpensive and hygienic, and altogether the best substitute possible where sewerage is not available. This consists of the ordinary outbuildings substituting a movable box for the pit or vault and throwing a cupful of dry dust or earth after each use. This deodorizes and disinfects completely, and the contents may be used without offense for a fertilizer. The dry earth closet is very widely used, and in no other city that I know of is vault building left unrestricted as in this city.

FOOD INSPECTOR'S DUTIES.

The duties of the newly appointed food inspector were fixed as follows: He is to obey all orders of the health commissioner and board of health, and to carry out in detail the ordinance prohibiting the keeping or sale of unwholesome food and drink, and regulating the sale of milk and other food products.

LICENSE RATES LOWERED.

Section 33 in chapter 22 was then taken up, and the license for real estate dealers was cut down from $50 to $25.

SEVERAL CHAPTERS PASSED.

Chapter 18 on electric light and gas, chapters 19 on irrigation, 20 on jailer, 21 on Liberty Park, 22 on licenses, 23 on local assessments, 24 on city marshal, 25 on mayor, 26 on misdemeanors, 27 on nuisances, and 28 on police, were read without further amendments, after which the Council adjourned until tonight.

AN OLD MORMON CEMETERY.

• The Council Bluffs (Iowa) Nonpareil of the 24th inst. contains the following, which may be of interest to the veterans and the families of the veterans who crossed the Missouri at an early date in the western migration of the Saints: Charles Lapworth, familiarly known as Charlie Lapper, of Payson, Utah, has been visiting in the city and vicinity for some days past. Mr. Lapworth was an old timer in Council Bluffs, having removed from here to Utah in 1850. He has been making inquiries concerning the old cemetery of the Mormons, at what was then called Council Point, a little northward of Lake Manawa.

A number of Utah people who resided in this city and county away back in the years from 1846 to 1853 have been concerned about reports that the cemetery has been washed into the Missouri river and that no trace could be found of the graves of their relatives and friends buried there at the time this city was a rendezvous for the Saints being gathered into the Utah Zion, but Mr. Lapworth a few days ago followed up the trace he made when here on a visit in 1871, and he finds that the cemetery has not been disturbed by the shifting courses of the Big Muddy. He has not needed the confirmation of his judgment in that respect by testimony received by him from old settlers in this locality.

Mr. Lapworth is a well preserved, intelligent man of seventy years, and converses interestingly about the wonderful changes that have taken place in this vicinity since the Mormons occupied the ground more than forty years ago. Referring to the old cemetery which he was highly gratified to find, he said a large number of the people buried there died of cholera in 1849 and the early fifties, and the people here of the present generation cannot realize the sufferings caused by that and other diseases prevalent and the hardships incident to free-life borne by their predecessors, who found western Iowa and eastern Nebraska a wilderness which furnished homes only for Indians and wild animals of the animal creation.

Mr. Lapworth visited a daughter in the county, but there are few others now alive in this vicinity whom he knew forty-two years ago.

He left for his home at Payson, Utah, last Tuesday evening.

ITEMS FROM CHESTER.

CHESTER, Sanpete Co., Nov. 25.—The World's Fair Columbian Club for Chester was duly organized today and the machinery though on a small scale was of a financial and promises a productiveness worthy of the cause and this State of Zion. The officers thereof are the same who so ably preside over the Ladies' Relief Society here, viz.: Mrs. Olive Acard, president, Mrs. Emma West and Mrs. Eliza B. Alfred vice-presidents, and Mrs. Annie W. Candland secretary and treasurer.

Ephraim's able artist, C. C. A. Christensen, has already stretched his canvases on which to portray Sanpete's contrast 1847-1892. The poverty of the outlook as to support to the Pioneers, the grandeur, the sublimity of the scene today as viewed from the tower of her magnificent temple, with all of its matured and maturing adornings, are to be truthfully portrayed, forwarded to the World's Fair, and in Utah's building, this beautiful sermon will have a conspicuous place, and having advertised again the faith and perseverance of the Saints, return to the corridor of the Mantle Temple, and in its beautiful colors say, "See what God and His Saints have wrought."

THE Y. M. M. I. A.

State Supt. John F. Alfred visited us last Sunday evening, re-organized, revived and put in motion this powerful auxiliary in the church programme for the development of the young men of Zion. The selection of officers emphasized the fact, the young man, etc., for in this instance they were all of caliber; Lars Christensen as president, Andrew Jensen and Pratt D. Alfred counselors, with Lawrence Rasmussen as secretary and treasurer, and making an innovation—Sunday evening, the night of their weekly meeting.

There is no quorum of Young Ladies here, hence no Y. L. M. I. A. Cause—marriage, academy or seminary depletes our ranks, but we hope in the near future these qualified young ladies will adorn our local institutions and homes.

AN INTERVIEW.

I did myself the pleasure recently to interview that old pioneer discoverer of coal, Bishop John Rees, of Wales, this country.

At the age of seventy years he is still active in exploring for coal. His early discovery in this line, in 1855, has drifted into the hands of the S. P. V. Ry., and the purchase of the canyon by Mr. Rees from Indian Chief Tabbeashan in 1857 is merged in the English company owning the S. P. V. Ry.

It would do you good to hear the old expert tell of his new "inexhaustible discovery" six miles north of Ephraim, with so good to build to it; it abuts on the valley proper, is excellent in quality for cooking, heating, and endurance, a veritable bonanza in the fuel line. Easily, after due opening was had, 150 tons per day could be loaded on the cars, and at $2.50 per ton would make glad the pocket of the most chary investor and give to a waiting community "the poor man's coal."

Wales is beautifully situated on the slope of the hills on the west side of the valley. So, as he salutes the earth each returning day, says his first obeisance to this peculiar place and people—peculiar, because of some of their manners, customs and language; thrifty, hardy, gifted in song and music, these sons and daughters of the "pure Adamite language" have created nice brick houses, gardens and apries unexcelled anywhere, and they have no saloons, nor loafers' corners. I thought at my interview, would it not be a novelty at the World's Fair if a venerable citizen from here, with his worthy dame, could walk the avenues of the fair decked in the habiliments of the principality—she with her ruffled shortened skirts, charming colored hose, buckled shoes, nekerchief of brilliant colors, her face surrounded with the stiffened frilled cap, and surmounted by the flat-brimmed, tall black beaver hat. It would be unique in its uniqueness.

WHAT IS THE NEXT SENSATION?

Politics has gone into the innocuous, the acrimony is hushed, and now all eyes and pockets are turned to your fair city, waiting for April 6, 1898. There is a responsiveness particularly pleasing to him who believes it is the "Mecca" of the Rocky mountains. Thanks to a kind Providence for an abundant harvest, cheapened railway facilities, thousands again can assemble in the Temple, so fittingly, beautifully, (and now realistically) predicted by Isaiah chap. 2, verses 2 and 3.

ITEM.

STAKE CONFERENCES.

BANNOCK.

The quarterly conference of this Stake was held in Rexburg, Sunday and Monday, November 20 and 21.

Those present: President T. E. Ricks, Counselor W. F. Rigby, Patriarch A. E. Hinckley, Bishops and other leading brethren. Meetings were held at the usual hours both days.

President T. E. Ricks called the conference to order. He was pleased to meet the Saints under so favorable circumstances. He gave a full report of the organizations of the Stake, which were all in a satisfactory condition. He also enumerated the business institutions of the country, and suggested how new enterprises could be established.

President W. F. Rigby discoursed upon the trials and persecutions of the Saints, and the growth of the Church, notwithstanding such opposition. Our future history will be as momentous and full of interest as the past.

F. S. Bramwell spoke of the unity that should prevail among the Saints. He testified that the heavens would be and are opened to the faithful.

Elders C. N. Watkins, Jacob Spori, T. E. Bassett and others addressed the meetings and gave many good instructions.

An important feature of the conference was the interest manifested to devise remunerative employment for the people. The Priesthood meeting took the subject up in a practical way, and effected a co-operative sheep organization open to all the Saints.

President T. E. Ricks was pleased with the whole proceedings of the conference, and referring to the Salt Lake Temple, asked all to prepare themselves to enter therein at the dedication now near at hand.

The weather throughout was good, and all who attended conference were well pleased for doing so, and returned to their homes greatly benefited thereby.

JAMES GILLESPIE,
Stake Clerk.

REXBURG, Idaho, Nov. 25, 1892.

UINTAH.

VERNAL, Nov. 21, 1892.—The quarterly conference of this stake occurred on the 6th and 7th of this month. We enjoyed the visit of Bro. L. J. Nuttall, who was the only representative we had from the outside. Our conference was well attended. The instructions given were pertinent to the conditions of the day. The reports of the ward Bishops were not very encouraging, much indifference being manifested among the people. Elder Thomas Karren, lately returned from a mission to Great Britain, saw the necessity of a reformation among the people, said the power of God was still made manifest among the nations of the earth, verifying the words of His faithful servants.

C. C. BARELLETT,
Clerk of Conference

FIRE DISTRICT CUT DOWN.

The City Council met last night to continue the third reading of ordinances. The members present were Beardsley, Evans, Simondt, Hardy, Herr, Lawson, Rich, Helms, Kelly, Moran and Wantland. Mr. Simondt presided.

FIRE DISTRICT CUT DOWN.

The following communication was received from the Inspector of buildings:

To the Honorable Chairman and City Council:

Gentlemen—I would hereby recommend that blocks 98, 94, 95, 97, 99 and 99, include, in plat A, that part of block 61 in plat C, blocks 13, 14, 15 and 16 in plat D, blocks 1 and 2 in plat J be hereby excluded from the fire limits, as in my judgment it is not necessary that these blocks above mentioned be in the fire limits, as it is nearly all residence property.

The recommendations were adopted:

SELLING LIQUOR.

A motion was made to amend section 20 in chapter 22 on licenses so as to read as follows: No one in person, or by his or her agent, bartender or employe," shall manufacture, sell, giveaway or deal out or otherwise dispose of any spirituous, vinous, malt or other intoxicating liquors, without first obtaining from the City Council a license therefore as hereinafter provided.

Postponed indefinitely.

TO BE BROUGHT TO GRADE.

The recorder was ordered to notify the street supervisor this morning to immediately have the intersection of Main and First South streets brought down to a permanent grade, including crosswalks at Richards street and in front of the Culmer block on First South street.

LAWSON'S PET MEASURE.

The new park ordinance, creating a board of park commissioners to look after Liberty Park and other public grounds belonging to the city, was read and on motion of Lawson was substituted for the present ordinance on Liberty Park.

WITHOUT CHANGE.

Chapters 29 on poll tax, 30 on prisoners, 81 on procedure, 82 on inspector of provisions, 38 on public lands and 34 on railroads were then read without further amendment.

RETURNED ELDERS.

Elder O. C. Dunford, of Bloomington, Bear Lake county, arrived in this city, on Sunday night from a mission to New Zealand. He left home on November 12th, 1898. The first six weeks were spent in the Walkato district; about three months were passed in Taupo, where Elder Dunford, assisted by his wife, taught school; and, next, he labored in the Mahia district or the period of a year and a half as a traveling Elder. During this time Sister Dunford was engaged in school work at Nuhaka. From Mahia district Elder Dunford was called to go to the Wairarapa district, over which he presided up to the date of his release. He reports favorably on the result of his work in the mission field, and says he was well treated by the people among whom he went. He comes back home in excellent health, his wife having preceded him a year ago.

Elders Peter M. Folkman, of Plain City, Weber county, Utah, Harry A. Bramwell of the same place, and Joseph Seely, of Mount Pleasant, Sanpete county, returned on the 19th inst., from a mission to the Southern states. They left home together on Nov. 4th, 1890. Elder Seely labored in Kentucky during the entire period. The first eight months Elder Bramwell spent in Mississippi, and the remainder of the time in Kentucky. Elder Folkman devoted his whole attention to North Carolina. Each of the missionaries made report favorably. They were well treated by the people among whom they sojourned, and while in some places there was found a desire among their hearers to investigate the true Gospel, in others the utmost indifference was exhibited. The missionaries come back to Utah in the best of health, and say they have had both a pleasant and profitable time.

ELECTION RETURNS.

The territorial board of canvassers, which body has been in session since November 17th, reached the end of their task Monday, Nov. 25th, Weber being the last county canvassed. The total vote of the Territory for delegate to Congress, as will be seen by the table given below, was an excellent one, namely, 34,577, against 23,785 at the previous election—an increase of 10,812. C. E. Allen, the Liberal candidate, received 94 more votes than those cast for C. C. Goodwin two years ago.

Of the total number of votes 34,577, Rawlins received 15,201, Cannon 12,900 and Allen 6986, giving Rawlins a plurality of 2811.

Yesterday morning the board of education inspected the new First ward school house on the corner of Thirtieth street and Pinyon avenue. Everything was found according to contract and the building will be formally accepted this morning.

B. B. Crane, the well known real estate man and capitalist, died at the city hospital yesterday of quick consumption. He had been seriously ill but four days. The remains were sent east to Columbus, Ohio, last evening for burial, the deceased being an old resident of that city.

Judge Bishop rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff yesterday afternoon in the case of Miles L. Jones vs. J. B. Stoddard et al., an order brought last February to recover rents amounting to $180 and damages for $200 and costs; amounting to $299. A writ was issued for the possession of the property involved.

Last Friday night Officers Davenport and Tyree found a tramp in the Union Pacific sand house who had both feet frozen, having walked from Kayeville in the blinding storm which raged on Thanksgiving day. The unfortunate man was placed in the city hospital, and the county will bear the expense.

William Southwood of Pleasant View was yesterday bound over to the grand jury in bonds of $1,500 by the justice of the peace for that precinct for alleged assault with intent to murder. Not having the necessary sureties he was committed to the care of Sheriff Elnap. Southwood said to have threatened to kill a companion while out hunting, thinking the latter had stolen some powder from his tent.

The necessary cash bonus to induce the Southern Pacific to remove its shops to Ogden was yesterday placed in escrow; the contract has been signed by all parties and everything is now in readiness to begin work on the necessary buildings. The brick to be used was contracted for. Judge Thomas Marshall was in Ogden yesterday attending to the legal questions which naturally arose in the definite settlement of the business.

George W. Vanderbilt, fourth son of the late William H. Vanderbilt, and Clarence Barker arrived in Ogden Sunday evening in the special Wagner car Swannanoa, from the west, coming in over the Central Pacific. They remained until last night, when their car was attached to the 8:15 o'clock Rio Grande Western east-bound passenger. The young men will remain at Salida, Colorado, to-night, in order that they may go through the Grand Canyon by daylight.

Dr. Gee Woo, of Omaha, president of the Wah Mee Exposition company, the corporation which will make the Chinese exhibit at the World's Fair, and Chan Pak Kwai, of Chicago, secretary of the company, arrived in Ogden on Sunday in company with Hong Sing who has been in Chicago on official business. The gentlemen are here to consult on matters connected with the Exposition. Dr. Woo about two months ago married Miss Cora De Witt, an American heiress of Omaha. Both he and Pak Kwai speak English very fluently.

Horatio T. Wood died at the City hospital yesterday afternoon at 5:30. He had been an inmate there for about six weeks and had been as nicely treated by the city officers as possible. He came here from Montana, and then went to Salt Lake, where he visited his brother, A. M. Wood, and then returned to Ogden. He was a mining expert and assayer, and in his profession had been salivated several times. This brought on illness while in Ogden and Mayor Turner kindly sent him to the hospital, where everything that could be done for his comfort and recovery was done. The efforts, however, were in vain and he died.

The gas well machinery for the Ohio & Utah Natural Gas company arrived yesterday and work will be commenced on the first well tomorrow morning. The well will be located in Wilson's lane, about three miles west from the city hall, and with the improved machinery obtained from Findlay, Ohio, by the company the pipe can be sunk to almost any depth. The company has leased several large tracts of land lying west of the city, and by hard work secured the right to parallel the track of the Rio Grande Western for five miles with gas mains.

The hearing in the case of William Garland vs Wheeler Brothers on an account of $468.18, occupied nearly the entire day in Judge Miner's court yesterday and when court adjourned was unfinished. Garland was the contractor on the Bear river canal and Wheeler Brothers sub-contracted. It was agreed that the estimates of work done by the engineer of the Bear Lake & River Waterworks company should be taken as a basis upon which the sub-contractors should receive their pay. The defendants claimed on a cross complaint that the estimates were false and fraudulent, and instead of their being indebted to Garland in the sum of $468.18, he is in their debt. Judge Miner ruled out their cross complaint.

At the weekly session of the city council last night, after one of the sharpest battles that has even taken place on the floor of the chamber during the present administration, that body passed—or did not pass—an ordinance repealing the existing salary ordinance to take effect December 31st. This, if legal, and signed by Mayor Turner, will leave the incoming council in the same position as was the present when it assumed the government of the city. After a long and heated discussion Mr. Elliott moved that in case the ordinance was approved by the mayor the recorder should have it published, but Mr. Cannon objected to the publication on the ground that it would be a waste of public money, the ordinance not having legally passed.

The latter gentleman called up the report of the committee on public buildings and grounds made some time ago, reporting back a number of proposals to sell to Ogden City 160 acres of land for cemetery and park purposes. The proposals were read in full and in connection therewith the committee offered a resolution in order to get the question which has been before the council so long, settled one way or another, providing that the bids of E. W. Matson offering the required number of acres for $12,000 and that of David Kay making the same offer for $50,000 be accepted, and that to defray the expense which would be incurred an issue of 20-year five per cent bonds be made. The resolution, report and all papers touching upon the matter were referred to the committee on finance.

George Lewis was arrested yesterday morning charged with film-flicking a Frenchman named Eugene Boyle out of $1,720. He was bound over in bonds of $1,000 to await his hearing on Thursday. The crooked—ork is supposed to have been done about the first of the month in an alleged cigar store owned by Lewis on lower Twenty-fifth street.

Boyle was formerly a sheep herder of Rawlins, Wyoming, and the cash represented his entire life's savings. It was deposited in a Wyoming bank and the Frenchman held a certificate of deposit. This Lewis and his friends are supposed to have robbed him or in a stud game. The certificate was cashed at the Ogden State bank. After being touched Boyle was rushed down to Salt Lake by the gang, ostensibly for the purpose of getting $500 of his money back, but in reality so time might be gained. He was accompanied as far as Reno when he gave up search of his cash, and went west. He returned to Ogden on Saturday and was found by the police yesterday morning. He had to be arrested before he would go to headquarters and report.

Yesterday afternoon Sheriff Arny Grundy, of Polk county, Minnesota, arrived on the delayed Southern Pacific passenger train from the west, having in charge C. L. Comings who is wanted in Crookston, in the same county and state, for the alleged embezzlement of $20,000. He placed his prisoner in the city jail under the charge of Jailer Baxter, leaving his extradition papers from the governor of Minnesota to the officers of San Bernardino, California, where Comings was arrested, as protection for the officer in case of trouble. Comings was a commission merchant, doing business in Crookston, and it is charged used the amount of money stated, which was confided to his care by his patrons. He did an extensive business and his operations extended all over the northwest. When discovered Comings fled to California taking the southern route. While in California he represented himself as capitalist in search of investments. He was arrested on a telegraphic warrant and description.

Yesterday Judge Thomas Marshall, of Salt Lake City, general attorney for the Southern Pacific railroad, and Superintendent S. W. Knapp, of this division of the same road, sitting under telegraphic instructions from the president and board of directors of the company, met with President Patton, of the chamber of commerce, and a large number of the leading men of Ogden, and entered into a written contract for the removal to Ogden of the Carlin, Nevada, and Terrace, Utah, shops. The removal will begin as soon as the weather breaks in the spring, and under the contract the company must have the shops completed and in full running order within thirteen months. The representatives of the railroad guarantee, however, that the machinery will be in operation in less than half that time. The bricks to be used in the construction of the buildings have been ordered and the necessary building supplies are being contracted for. The works will be located in the north end of the present railroad yards, the surveys having already been made. Indications also point to the speedy erection here of Rio Grande Western shops and roundhouses, and it is understood the Union Pacific has under consideration a proposition to remove its shops to Ogden.

The heavy fall of snow and severe weather has caused an absolute cessation of work on the placer gold claims in Cottonwood canyon, a few miles above Peterson, Morgan city, and nowhere there is a change in the temperature soon the mines will be closed until spring. L. W. Tackett yesterday exhibited several large nuggets taken from the tunnel, which is now thirty feet, and says that when they ceased operations every rock seemed to serve as a cover for the gold. The claim was discovered purely by accident. Tackett has been in the habit of making annual hunting excursions in Weber canyon and side canyons, and about a month ago equipped himself for that purpose. In going up Cottonwood canyon he passed a splendid prospect, being worked by parties from Morgan city, about which very little has been said. He decided to keep a sharp lookout and a few miles further up the stream stumbled over what gives abundant promise of being one of the greatest gold fields in the country. The claims are on a gravelly bar, which is nearly 1500 feet in width and runs up against the mountain. The usual characteristics of an extensive gold field are not wanting.

A FURIOUS STORM.

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 27.—The stormy weather of the last few days culminated shortly before midnight last night in a furious gale, which increased in intensity until noon today. The wind then slackened somewhat but was still blowing heavily at 6 o'clock. The weather and sea are so bad that no ships left port, and there have been only one or two arrivals. Even in the sheltered bay the sea is unprecedentedly heavy. Ships were torn from their anchorages and knocked together, and those lying at the wharves were considerably damaged. There have been innumerable accidents, but so far no fatalities have been reported. The British ship Stroum and the ship Occidental fouled each other in the stream and were damaged. The ships Talisman and Manchester collided and were considerably damaged. The ship Nereus broke from anchorage and drifted against the ship Benicia and the schooner Laura Pike, and all three were seriously damaged. The Harrison street wharf was badly damaged.

Innumerable other cases of similar nature are reported. The wind was accompanied by a pelting rain, which fell steadily for twelve hours. There are indications of more wind and rain. Telegraph wires are in bad shape and most of today San Francisco was cut off from connection with the outside world.

The storm continues tonight with almost unabated fury.

Heavy rain is falling and a high wind is blowing. In addition to the damage of San Francisco and Oakland shipping suffered severely at Sausalito and Tiburon on the Marin county shore. The damage at Tiburon alone is estimated from $20,000 to $30,000, and probably as much more was done at Sausalito. At Tiburon the yacht Belle, valued at $7000, was blown ashore and pounded to pieces. The yacht Duke was also wrecked as well as a number of house boats and small boats. At Sausalito the big iron steamer George W. Elder dragged her anchor and went on the rocks where she pounded a hole in her bottom. She was pulled off by a tug but is still in a dangerous position and liable to get ashore again if the wind changes. Half a dozen big ships were soon up on the mud flats, but their position is not considered dangerous.

The gasoline launch Marion was driven under the big ferry boat Tamalpais and sunk. The yacht Nellie also ran into the Tamalpais and was badly battered. The valuable steam launch Mary McNeil was driven ashore. The Tamalpais land and water wharf was destroyed by the heavy seas. The damage to big ships on the San Francisco and Oakland sides of the bay cannot be estimated until they go on the dry dock for repairs. The big iron ships Talisman, Benicia and Nereus had their plates stove in and spars broken while in collision. Hundreds of small sail and row boats were knocked to pieces or sunk.

In San Francisco the wind did no very great harm. Some trees were blown down and chimneys toppled over. The rain also caused a few sewers to break and washed out gardens and yards. At Golden Gate Park the Casino was unroofed and the plants and shrubbery suffered some injury. The storm is general throughout northern and central California, but beyond a few buildings unroofed no damage is reported.

DEATH OF BISHOP ROBERT DAINES.

The death of our beloved Bishop Robert Daines has cast a gloom over the quiet homes of the Latter-day Saints of this place. Brother R. Daines was born at St. Cross, Suffolk, England, Aug. 3rd, 1829; died Nov. 16th, 1892, after an illness of eleven weeks, during which time he suffered severely from inflammation of the bladder. He was baptised into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints the 17th day of December, 1851, by Wm. Smith; married Mary Ann Barker, October, 11th, 1850, by whom he had four children, three of whom he buried in England. He emigrated with his wife to America November 1855; landed in New York January 1, 1856; lived there about one year and there buried his last child. He then moved to New Jersey, where he buried his wife on January 1, 1858. In the spring of 1859 he came on to the frontiers and after a short stay married Jemima Seamons on May 1, 1859; started across the plains July 22, 1859; drove a Church team in Feramont Little's company; arrived at Salt Lake City September 8, 1859; moved to Cache valley in the spring of 1860, and settled by a small spring where Hyde Park now stands. He then labored to make his first home. In the fall of 1861 he was called by Bishop William Hyde to labor as an acting Teacher among the people and became the president of that body of men. In 1864 he was ordained a Seventy. After the death of Bishop William Hyde, he was chosen and set apart Bishop of Hyde Park ward under the hands of Brigham Young, Jr., on May 20th, 1871. He was ordained a High Priest May 20th, 1877, and again set apart a Bishop by Apostle C. C. Rich. At the April conference, 1885, he was called to go to England on a mission and returned on the 8th of May, 1886, on account of ill health. In the spring of 1887 he went with others to Canada and stayed on Lees Creek about two years; returned on February 24th, 1889, and resumed his position as Bishop. This position he filled with much credit and was respected by the people, among whom he made many warm friends, who, together with a numerous family, mourn his departure. He was the father of twenty-two children, six of whom preceded him to the spirit world. He died as he had lived, full of faith hope and charity, awaiting a glorious resurrection.

THE MONETARY CONFERENCE.

BRUSSELS, Nov. 28.—The international monetary conference met again today. Rothschild's proposals were submitted to the conference this afternoon. They cover eleven octavo pages. Rothschild argues at great length that bimetalism in Great Britain is absolutely impossible. He suggests that the question arises whether it is not possible to extend silver generally, and by this means assist in checking the further fall in value. Rothschild said he did not claim that his proposals would prove a final solution of the question, but they would prove palliative.

Summed up, his proposals are that American countries continue the purchase of silver, and European powers buy an amount equal to £5,000,000 sterling every year for five years at 43d. If silver should rise above that price, purchases are to be moderately suspended. The Portuguese delegates have been instructed by their government to act in harmony with the British representatives. It is stated that Rothschild proposes to raise the legal tender of silver in England from two pounds to five. Great importance attaches to the proposal, as it means that English £5 notes will be payable in silver.

Rothschild said, in part, that he felt that a gold standard in England was the only possible one, and that if they considered that her whole commerce and a large part of that of other countries was carried on by bills of exchange on London, which were naturally payable in gold, it must be admitted that the world generally transacts business on a gold basis and that a double standard, with the exception of a very modified form, does not exist even in those countries professing to pay in either metal. Whatever international agreement may be made, or whatever ratio is chosen, gold alone will always be the favorable medium of settling large debts or making remittances. Germany's action in 1873 and the action of Italy, Austria and Russia in amassing gold is conclusive proof of the appreciation of great European countries of the advantage of a gold standard. Apart from other considerations it seemed to him that a universal arrangement of the currency question was impossible, as the wealth and sources of expenditures of no two countries are alike. It would be impossible to carry on the trade of the world on a sound basis if the debtor was allowed the option of paying in whatever currency suited him.

Rothschild thought some such arrangement as he proposed would give general satisfaction. The gold market would also be relieved, as only European appeals will be made thereto for a long time, and as South Africa is increasing her output of gold the arrangement suggested would enable Russia and Austria to complete their purchases without unduly interfering with the money market. If the conference adjourns without having accomplished any definite result it will cause a fall in silver frightful to contemplate. It will cause a monetary panic, added Rothschild, of which it is impossible to tell the far-reaching effects. After discussing the proposals were referred to a committee to consider. The committee includes Sir G. Fremantle (British), Guilford Moleworth (India), H. W. Cannon (United States), M. Foville (France), Sig. Simonelli (Italy) and M. Radzavitch (Russia), with Alfred De Rothschild and M. Levi (Belgium) as ex-officio members. The conference adjourned until Friday. The American delegates authorized the Associated Press representative to state they are thoroughly satisfied with the turn of events and consider Rothschild's plan and today's action of the conference as amply justifying the convoking of the conference.

THE SILVER CONFERENCE.

BRUSSELS, Nov. 29.—The committee appointed yesterday by the international monetary conference to consider the proposals of Alfred Rothschild is made up as follows: Sir C. Fremantle, Great Britain, Sir Guilford L. Moleworth, India; Henry W. Cannon, United States; De Foville, France; Simondy, Italy; C. F. Tjelfen, Denmark; N. P. Vanderberg, Netherlands; Hans L. Forsell, Sweden and Norway; Osma, Spain; Cramer Frey, Switzerland; Sainotte, Belgium, and Radzavitch, Russia; Alfred de Rothschild, Great Britain and M. Montefiore Levi, president of the conference, as ex-officio members. The committee will also consider the plans suggested by Levi and Professor Adolph Seebecker. Professor Seebecker's plan is to establish one gramme of fine gold as the international unit of value, and stop the minting of coins containing less than 5.8065 grammes of pure gold. The circulation of coin of foreign countries of less than the new standard shall be prohibited by the countries signing the agreement, and gold coin of inferior value shall be withdrawn within five years. Private individuals shall be allowed to coin gold upon the payment of the agreed seignorage. Gold certificates may be held against gold held in reserve. Seebecker's plan also includes the coinage of silver in proportion to twenty value units of that metal to one of gold, but private individuals shall not be allowed the free coinage of silver. Of the committee that will consider the proposals, five of the members are avowed bimetalists, six monometalists and one doubtful. The committee will sit twice each day. It is the general expectation that Rothschild's proposal will be accepted by the committee and then referred for adoption or rejection to the conference and the governments represented, with modifications suggested by the schemes of Levi and Seebecker. One of the modifications suggested by the schemes of Levi and Seebecker will undoubtedly be that all gold coins below the value of 20 francs be withdrawn from circulation and replaced by silver notes.

The adhesion of the German delegates is considered certain as Doctor Bend, formerly president of the Reichsbank, has approved the main lines of Seebecker's proposal. The French representatives will also accept the plan of Seebecker, which was communicated by Tirard, French ex-minister of finance. This plan was favorably received by all the French delegates before being submitted to the conference. With the prospect of an early agreement being achieved, nobody now talks of the failure of the conference, which at first was the only prediction made as to the outcome of the meeting. So rapidly has the optimistic feeling grown that it is expected the conference is likely to conclude its labors next week. It was said last week that the session would last until after Christmas. The American delegates have strong reasons to be satisfied with the recognition by the advocates of monometalism of the seriousness of the dangers arising from a further fall in silver. They are disposed to support Rothschild's proposals on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread. The Indian delegates are also pleased with the proposals, as they will assist the conclusions of the Indian currency committee, and their acceptance will free India from fear of a large fall in silver. The American delegates believe the continuous absorption of thirty million ounces of silver by the United States would bring about artificially a condition of the silver market which international bimetalism could establish permanently and scientifically.

The delegates are combining some pleasure with work. Interchange of dinners proceeds almost nightly. The American and British representatives have been to the performance of an English company playing "Faust up to Date." In Brussels, at the conclusion of the conference, the burgomaster contemplates giving a grand municipal ball in honor of the delegates.

- PRESS COMMENTS.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—Referring to the proceedings of the monetary conference the Daily News says: Rothschild's plan which seems to have saved the conference from collapsing, turns out to be a mild palliative and in no wise heroic. Theoretically, it would be best to let silver alone, but when we find that Rothschild is trying to oath and nail the evident collapse of the conference, it may be supposed that such a result would be disastrous. We cannot suppose it to be remotely suggested that five-pound notes be made redeemable in silver. The most striking part of the plan is the implied belief of the first class of financiers, that unless something is done America will discontinue the purchase of silver. America perhaps is the richest country in the world and cannot be ignored. Were she to sell silver we might be compelled to close the Indian mints. Even then we might be terribly hampered if America raised a big gold loan. It is not in England's interests to precipitate a currency crisis in America. The disturbance of the trade would amount to a catastrophe.

PROVO LETTER.

PROVO, Nov. 29.—On Sunday afternoon, while playing at the top of the second story of the unfinished South worth building, Johnny Freshwater, a boy thirteen years of age, fell through a skylight to the ground floor, striking the joists of the second floor on the way. When picked up he was unconscious, and remained so until one o'clock Monday morning. No bones were broken, but he sustained some bruising on the right side of his head and body. At last reports he was very irrational in his talk.

J. T. Jakeman has been brought down from Salt Lake to answer to the charge preferred against him by R. A. Barney, of obtaining money under false pretenses. This morning his attorney, A. G. Sutherland, argued a demurrer to the complaint in Justice Gash's court.

Dr. A. J. Shores and family, of Payson, departed for La Plata, Missouri, this morning, their former home. The trip is occasioned by the serious illness of Mrs. Shores' father.

Mining men feel confident that rich mines will yet be discovered not far from this city. Mr. Kraupa reports an assay of ore coming from the vicinity of Castle Springs which went 41 ct. in silver and $3.50 in gold.

Bishop Scanlan of Salt Lake was in the city yesterday on business connected with the Catholic church which is to be built.

The regular county organization of the World's Fair holds a meeting on Wednesday evening next, at which all citizens are invited to be present.

A session of the city council was held last night and considerable business transacted. T. O. Jones was granted the privilege of having a refreshment stand at the bank corner. Several repairs of bridges, etc., were ordered made, and a number of claims were allowed. But the really interesting portion of the meeting was the making of a number of fiery speeches by several of the members concerning an editorial which appeared in the Enquirer of November 17th, 1892. I quote: "Yea, more, our Democratic city council has adopted a plan which excludes from the public the amount paid, or donated, to their party organ. The city officers all allowed a contingent fund, so called, and then they are instructed to pay for their own printing. For example, $100 is appropriated to the recorder, another hundred to the marshal, etc. These gentlemen pay the Dispatch whatever may suit their purposes, even though double what they could get the same work done in our office for, and the public never gets to know of it. The account of the officers every month or every three months, as the case may be, is settled as 'contingent expenses' the Dispatch robbery included. If the printing bills come before the council, there are Republican members who would show up the enormous cost compared with what the Inquirer Co. charges. That would not suit the purpose of the Dispatch stockholders, who are members of the council, so they propose to do their dishonest tricks in the dark, like the common thief."

The city marshal and the recorder reported the disbursement of their contingent funds, but no printing item appeared in either report.

Councillors Irvin, Maiben, Probert, McCullough and Barney made speeches denouncing in the strongest terms the Inquirer. They claimed that the charges were absolutely false, and that the editor knew they were false when they were made, etc. Maiben and Irvine threatened to commence libel suits. The fire bell rang, but the council were too interested to heed. The discussion was continued. The fire alarm, however, was a false one.

WESTERN NEWS ITEMS.

Jack Crawford, the poet scout, has has written a poem in honor of the coming silver convention at El Paso, and dedicated it to the McGinty club of that city.

The Fort Collins, Colo., Courier says: "There is enough surplus alfalfa in Larimer county this fall to feed and fatten 100,000 sheep. Bring on the sheep and our farmers will fit them for mutton. Chicago will want them next spring and summer."

THE FACT that a full-blooded Indian is a conductor on one of the street-car lines in a northwestern city, causes a smart paragrapher to remark that "none but the bravest deserve the fare." He ought to be bloused for damages, even if his watch has to be pawned (ed) to pay the judgment.

David Stringer, for years chief assayer for the Crescent company at Park City, and father of Thomas, Edward and Joseph Stringer, old employees of the company, has just died in Spanish Fork of dropsy, superinduced by the effects of lead poison absorbed while following assaying.

The Montana Gold, Silver, Platinum and Tellurium company at Nebart will make another $15,000 shipment of ore very soon. This company has recently cut the second level in their ground with a long tunnel striking it 500 feet beneath the surface. It is a five foot vein and the ore carries $18 in gold and free milling. It also carries some silver.

The Elbert (Colorado) county Banner urges that the people of Elizabeth should unite in an effort to get the Union Pacific to erect stockyards and scales at that point. It asserts that thousands of head of cattle are each year driven to other points for shipment, and that the Union Pacific might as well have the patronage if it would only provide the facilities.

There was a lively fire in the brush-rushes that skirt Great Salt Lake southwest of Brigham. The wind was blowing a gale and the flames brightly illuminated the sky as they leaped along through the forest of rushes at a surprising gait. They could have done little damage except lay waste a number of acres of winter range and eat up some fences. — Bugler.

Mrs. Lorenzo Hansen and her mother an aged lady, were thrown from a cart and the latter painfully but not seriously injured last week. The other lady was not hurt. They were driving down from the farm. The Judges Knowles, in the United States circuit court at Montana, has decided that the transfer of a gang of men from a division in Canada to a division in Montana is in the nature of a contract and subject to the provisions of the contract labor law. The case in question came up in the suit against the Great Falls and Canada Railroad company for violation of the contract law in so transferring a gang of fifteen men. The case will now be tried to ascertain the facts. There are twenty-six cases pending against the company.

Judge Standrod (says the Idaho Register) sentenced Phillip Clifford, the fellow who is supposed to have set fire to Keefer's saloon about a month ago, to ten years in the penitentiary. He was arrested and tried for burglary, for breaking into Ingersoll's house and stealing a lot of clothing, and was found guilty of burglary in the first degree. In passing sentence the court said he had investigated his past career and found he had served a term of eight years in the Utah penitentiary and had been out only a short time. He was too dangerous a person to be at large.

Moscow (Idaho) Mirror: Probably the most distressing accident which has occurred in the vicinity of Moscow in the past year has just taken place at the home of Mr. John Johnson, three miles southeast of Moscow, and which resulted in the death of Joe Haas, the 11-year-old son of Mr. Johnson. The boy was assisting an employee in hauling some straw, and when the noon hour arrived the team was unhitched and the boy mounted one of the horses to ride to the barn, but as the bridle had been removed the animal became unmanageable and the boy slid off but was caught in the harness.

A letter was received last week from J. J. Sweeney who left the Park something over one year ago in company with W. B. Edwards for Australia. Mr. Sweeney is now in South Africa, having left Edwards in Australia. He reports it as a great country and says that an immense amount of the yellow metal is being taken from the rock down there. He says the claims are 600x1500 feet, and that each one has a quartz mill on it in active operation. Mr. Sweeney says he did not like Australia but thinks there is a good chance in South Africa to make a raise. — Park City Record.

As Joseph Willey, of Teton, Idaho, a young man about sixteen years of age was returning from the timber with a load of wood, a slight shower of rain began to fall and he reached on his load for his Winchester so he could cover it up with quilts. In dragging the gun, which was an old fashioned 45 60, the charge went off entering the right side near the loins and coming out about one inch below the left nipple. His father who was along and a number of others got the wounded man to Teton by about dark, and Dr. Rivers was sent for. An examination showed that both lungs were penetrated and that he was bleeding internally. Death ensued next day.

D. W. Schnelder was taken before U. S. Commissioner Hindsdale at Denver on Saturday, charged with being an accessory after the act of Alexander McKenzie, who held up the Spurr City and Creede stage September 28 last, and relieved carrier G. M. Pemberton of the United States mail. Schnelder, it is claimed received McKenzie and concealed him in his cabin, aiding him in every way in his power to avoid the officers of the law. The prisoner pleaded not guilty and was held in $1000 bonds. Being unable to furnish these he was committed to jail to await trial. McKenzie is already confined there.

Andy Mehan has just died in Albuquerque of consumption. Deceased was well known in Tombstone several years ago. He figured conspicuously in the Daly mining suit which occupied the attention of the last term of court here. It will be remembered that after killing Constable Lowther at Bisbee, Daly's whereabouts could not be found. Six months after the killing, a deed executed in Denver by Daly to Mehan here and caused much comment. Mehan, although he knew at that time and probably knew at the time of his death the whereabouts of Daly, for whose apprehension a reward of $3000 is outstanding, never revealed the secret to anyone and carried it with him to his grave. — Prospector.

During the current term of the supreme court that august tribunal will be called upon to decide whether or not it is a crime to "attempt to commit arson," says the Idaho Democrat. The question arises in the appeal of John Collins, the man who earnestly endeavored to set fire to the jail at Idaho Falls. He did not accomplish his design, but the district court, taking the spirit for the deed found him guilty, and he was sent to the penitentiary. His attorney contends that he has been wrongfully punished, the statutes of Idaho not recognizing attempted arson as a crime. The settlement of this peculiar question will not, however, be the most intricate skein that the court will have to unravel, there being a large number of important cases on the docket.

Dr. W. Finlay Thompson of Palmer Lake died a few days since at some point on the coast of Mexico of yellow fever. The news of his death will prove a great shock to his friends throughout Colorado, especially in Denver, says the News, where he was intimately associated with many leading citizens in various enterprises. Dr. Thompson invested large sums of money in Palmer Lake on the faith that it would ultimately become an attractive summer resort. He did much to beautify the place, and it first sprung into prominence through his efforts. His beautiful home, "Elatemere House," was one of the loveliest spots in that section. Two years ago Dr. Thompson removed his family to New York and last year he went to Mexico to look after several interests. He leaves a wife and three daughters in New York. His aged mother and his sister reside at Palmer Lake.

A prominent army officer was in the city yesterday, says the Denver News, and in the course of conversation expressed the opinion that Denver would before very long be made the headquarters of a military department, saying in explanation that "there has been talk for a good while of several important changes in the present Arizona department. This is now made up of New Mexico, Arizona and a part of California, with headquarters at Los Angeles. The new dispensation provides for the incorporation of the entire state of California in the department of California, and the formation of a new division to be known as the Mountain department, made up of Arizona, New Mexico and Colorado. If this should be carried out, and there is every probability that it will, then the headquarters of the new department will either be at Denver or Santa Fe, with the chances largely for the former on account of General McCook's prejudice in its favor."

MR. JEFFERSON.

[New York Sun.]

"Cries" in politics are momentous. A first-rate "cry" seems good for 100,000 votes any time. It is essential to a good political cry that it express something trivial in itself, but profoundly significant, something whose significance is palpable to the plainest understanding.

The first issue of this sort in America was Mr. Jefferson's red breeches. Washington had had a court. Stately, in laced coat, he had received homage with the ceremonial of a sovereign. Congress at its opening dutifully presented him with an address following the procedure of Parliament. Mr. Jefferson would have none of it. He sent his own message to Congress by the hand of a plain messenger. While in the White House he preserved the habits of a country gentleman. He rode daily, and on his return hung his bridle over a post. And he wore a pair of red small clothes.

All of this was disgusting to the nabobs and big wigs of the Federalist party, and they marked their sentiments by disparaging allusions to Mr. Jefferson's red breeches. To the plain people who adored Jefferson for his part in abolishing the old feudal constitution of Virginia and securing equality in the one adopted for Kentucky, the red garment became a symbol of their dearest rights. They rallied to the small clothes, and the Democracy everywhere understood what the red breeches stood for in political controversy with the advocates of property gratification and a Sedition act for the suppression of free speech.

The next issue of this order was that implied in the war cry of Old Hickory testifying to enthusiasm for Gen. Jackson, in allusion to his walking stick. What it stood for was the popular estimate of that hero's resolute, uncompromising and entirely candid character. His disregard of all politic arts, and his thoroughgoing partisanship. The man who never gave up a friend nor quailed before any combination of enemies was summed up and symbolized by his favorite cane. "Old Hickory" proclaimed a harmless and indifferent personal habit, but it stood for much.

Next came a seemingly ridiculous parade of a log cabin. What the log cabin stood for was far enough from ridiculous. The country was tired to death of a wrangle protracted through years over a tariff schedule. The fight over the principle had been fought out and settled. Protection had been accepted. William Henry Harrison had been nominated. He stood for nothing in particular but rest and peace. His opponent stood for nothing in particular, but his supporters were profoundly dissatisfied with one another. At this juncture some one was injudicious enough to sneer at the Western candidate for having lived in a log cabin where he had nothing to drink but hard cider. Gentlemen worthy to guide a nation, it was assumed, drank Madeira or French brandy.

Here was the cry. The log cabin and hard cider stood not only for one of the plain people, but it stood for a term of tariff peace and quiet, and a chance for the country to pull itself together after the revulsion. So Harrison was elected amid one enormous show of enthusiasm for a log cabin and a drink of only moderate intrinsic popularity.

Next came the "Mill-boy of the Slashes." When men wore coonskin caps in parade and carried poles with uneasy live coons fastened atop. All of which stood for Henry Clay, who had been turned down when his party thought it didn't need his personal magnetism, and was at last put up to save it when its opposition to the annexation of Texas, which had applied for admission, left it nothing else to stand on before the people. Parties had learned by previous experiences that the time had passed when it would do to make the lowliness of a statesman's origin a matter of reproach to him. In fact, that some lowliness has become something to trade on.

Henry Clay had been born in "The Slashes" of Virginia in the humblest circumstances, and it is fact or fable that he had once been a mill boy. So much for his name. His adopted State of Kentucky idolized him, and the popular notion of the Kentuckian of the period was a person clad in buckskin, bearing an exceeding long rifle, which none but he could balance, and topped off with a coonskin cap. The popular woodcut of Daniel Boone arrays him thus: the banded tail of the coon will be observed hanging down from the hind side of the cap. So the cry was for that same old coon. For Mr. Clay had been a candidate through the lifetime of a generation. All of the demonstration stood for his personal popularity and magnetism, and for nothing besides, except opposition to the popular extension of territory. Neither "mill boy" nor "Same Old Coon" worked this time. Mr. Clay was beaten.

Four years later, when there was a chance to win, his party turned Clay down again and put up Gen. Taylor. The country was fired by war enthusiasm. Taylor's opponent was a civilian. Taylor was a Southern man who could and did carry certain Southern States against which the Whigs had professed implacable enmity. During the war Gen. Taylor had ridden a white horse, "Old Zach," and "Old Whitley" made a famous cry. White horse-tail hairs, represented to be authentic, were beheld with reverence. Persons then in the tenderness of youth may remember having handled one—not without awe. "Old Zach" and "Old Whitley" stood for the war enthusiasm and were elected.

Next the Whigs tried to repeat the canvass of '48 by trading on the same feeling and putting up Gen. Scott, the real military figure of the Mexican war. But he was nicknamed "Fuss and Feathers," and having once begun a despatch with the words, "After a hasty plate of soup," the expression was made a text for much clumsy but effective ridicule. The people were not in the habit of taking soup. The practice marked persons sophisticated by the habits of wealth. But there was more in "Fuss and Feathers." Though an able soldier, a patriot and no mean diplomatist, Scott was a vain man, and had not had the art to conceal the weakness. Besides, the Fugitive Slave law had begun to annoy. Southern sovereignty, repudiation of the Missouri Compromise, and extension of slavery were in the air. Scott was a Virginian, and the tariff had been dug up again. There was a landslide for Franklin Pierce, some had nicknamed him Frank Penguin, with nothing against him. Before this time the word "Doughface" had come into use as a term of reproach for what was described as a Northern man with Southern principles. In this campaign it was banded freely.

Next came the candidacy of Fremont the Pathfinder, against James Buchanan, the old Public Functionary, words by which he once alluded to himself in a State paper. To the Fremont cry it was appropriately retorted that he was a pathfinder who always lost his way, a retort with the barbed sting of truth in it.

Then the country had the canvass of Old Abe, Honest Abe, the Rail Splitter. The reply was Black Republican, a variant on the Red Republicans of the French Revolution, Miscegenationist, and "Do you want your sister to marry a nigger?" Both were effective. The rail splitter got less than 40 per cent of the vote, and the retorts had contributed to prevent his getting more. It will be recognized that this canvass represented passions in an acute stage, frenzied and only just articulate.

Then U. S. Grant was Unconditional Surrender Grant, words aptly fitting his initials quoted from his reply to a flag asking terms for the surrender of Fort Donaldson early in the war. His opponents were Copperheads. Public feeling was still far from amiable. It was made one of Grant's merits that he had once taken to tanning, though he had not made a good tanner. Humility of origin or of career was still not to be despised as a source of power with the people.

For Hayes there was no cry that could be raised, and so he was defeated. "Securing the Results of the war" was the nearest approach to one, but, considering the feats of the carpet baggers, it seemed a sarcasm.

Garfield was believed once to have driven mules on the towpath of a canal. Though this campaign issue may have helped him some, it does not take historic rank with Mr. Jefferson's nether garments. Mr. Clay's apprenticeship in the flour mills or Mr. Lincoln's feats with the beetle and wedge.

Mr. Blain's apotheosis as a white plumed knight, after so questionable a character as Henry the Great and of Navarre, implied his personal popularity and magnetism. His candidacy under impossible conditions recalls that of Gen. Harrison's first canvass was read under his grandfather's hat—the witty image of the entire series. He is in spite of it. His second was typified by the substitution of "ice cart" for slang "band wagon," a second edition of genuine wit. With this edition the canvass now closed went off without popular shibboleths that meant anything. The war cry of No Force Bill is no figure of speech, but the excitement of the dominant and winning side.

OTHER HORN OF THE DILEMMA.

UNDER the new ordinance, relating to the matter of honest weight in coal, the city weighmaster seems likely to become the recipient of enmities and side which those of even the dogber will sink into insignificance. As stated as coming from the dealers themselves that when business is going smoothly they send out of their yards during working hours a team of coal amounting to about a ton per minute. When we consider the population to be supplied, and the utility and quantity of the product in which they have been supplied, the estimate is probably a fair one, fifteen or eighteen hundred pounds of coal, dirt and coal mixed doesn't last as long as two thousand pounds of the pure article; and hence the purchaser the former has occasion more frequently to do his part toward keeping the dealers' one-ton-per-minute stage.

Of course the weighmaster's fees will be paid by the purchaser, who thinks the enterprising dealers are going to dispense with their private scales and do business with the official chisel at their own expense doesn't know them. They are not handling merely for their health; neither is the business of the city's weighmaster to take his pay in the gratitude of the community. But we think he can aid. In this emergency, to be modest and let the others do the work. In other words, he ought to do business at wholesale rates, since he will be in it on a large scale. We expect nothing else than that when the dealers are compelled to deliver his receipt with each, they will add a quarter or half a ton extra for the longer haul made necessary through their heaving to go to office. For little tricks of this kind the community must be prepared, though against them it may be helpless; but it is not prepared and does not seem to be burdened too heavily by a servant through the effort of the fathers to secure a measure of peace. In the satisfaction that will be felt at knowing that each one gets a measure and fair quality of what he pays for, it must not be forgotten that the present tight times and at the present price, a ton of coal nearly as a poor man's back every three weeks.

THE GERMAN CRISIS.

THE most sensational European topic now is the inquiry into the Panama scandal; but of hardly less interest and of vastly more importance is the proposition presented to the German parliament by the chancellor of empire and warmly endorsed by Emperor William, for an enormous increase in the military budget. The features of the new bill, briefly stated, are that the term of compulsory military service shall be reduced from three years to two, but that the standing army shall be largely increased in number; and its promoters evidently hope that by humoring the people in the first particular (for military service is exceedingly unpopular with the masses), they will arouse less opposition to the demand for the immense sums that will be needed for carrying out the latter part of the programme.

It need be said of the Iron Bismarck that he sought difficulties for the mere pleasure of overcoming them; and it looks as though the young Kaiser derived enjoyment in a similar way. Certainly to the casual observer this would seem to be a time in the highest degree inopportune for the levying of fresh taxes upon the people of Germany, groaning as they are under existing burdens, with the additional evils of low wages and industrial depression. Such a policy would imperil the continuance of almost any ministry in other lands, and under the circumstances would not be without its menace to the crowned head itself. Caprivi may indeed be forced out of office by this move, if the opposition develops the strength that is expected; but that result is unlikely, and it is quite absurd to think that the Emperor's throne will be in the least shaken or that he will lose in any degree the genuine affection in which he is held by his subjects.

On the contrary, he seems to have managed the matter thus far with singular adroitness, and there is every reason to believe he will prove to the opposition that he is not the novice in diplomacy some of them, and notably Bismarck himself, have thought him. One weapon he knows how to use with a master hand—and that is the appeal to patriotism. Let it once be hinted that the Fatherland is in danger and every German rallies enthusiastically to the rescue, be it either with sabre and gun or with the willing fulfillment of the most onerous financial requirement. Pointing to France on the west and Russia on the east, he has experienced, and we think will experience, no trouble in rousing the national heart; and when he offers the boon of shorter service in the army in return for a much more effective war establishment—one in fact that could crush an enemy at the first onslaught—the appeal would seem to be one that could scarcely be resisted. His further proposition to raise the revenue from taxes on the three B's, "Bier, Boerse and Brantwein,"—beer, the stock exchange and brandy,—is catchy, too; and the rabble are likely to be taken by storm and his policy fulfilled.

Still, he has to measure swords this time with an abler and stronger opposition than has ever yet confronted him. The exhibition cannot fail to be entertaining, and is pretty sure to be instructive. One would think that France and Russia,—the former especially, since in his programme lies a distinct threat against her,—would be not disinterested spectators, as they cast meaning glances at each other across the stormy realm whose turbulence or quietude has so much significance for them.

A GOAL STILL UNATTAINED.

Against the view of the ordinary citizen, that Arctic expeditions are not worth what they cost in perils, hardships and money, we have the assurance of two distinguished experts, General Greeley and Professor Hellprin, that polar exploration deserves more encouragement than it receives, and that neither the risk nor the expense is worthy to be considered in the same connection with the benefits that accrue to science and human knowledge through the efforts that are made to reach the Pole. Both these gentlemen recently read papers before the Contemporary club of Philadelphia, and each advanced reasons for the faith that is within him.

The professor justifies the outlay of money and the willingness to brave the frosty dangers in the aid that is thus extended to commerce and in the additions that are made to the world's stock of scientific knowledge. The general finds justification for such journeys by naval officers like Lieut. Peary in "the benefit that comes to the service from the examples of daring, skill and heroism displayed under privations and in the midst of dangers;" he argues that we have no wars now-a-days to develop our young officers, hence their energy and initiative of action may well be permitted to blossom into vigorous life in these hazardous expeditions.

In none of this logic is there anything that is new. Such contributions as have been made to the supply of practical knowledge by recent polar expeditions are so meager and unsatisfactory that no one can be blamed for suggesting that at the price named "they come mighty high." As to the other idea—that the ice-field is desirable as a means of supplying tests of heroism for an example to the officers engaged in Uncle Sam's service—it scarcely merits the name of argument; coming from anyone but a veteran like General Greeley it would be considered trivial.

Nevertheless, the necessity for strong argument in support of their opinion does not exist. The adventurous spirit of the age will continue to develop itself as it has done in the past, in the hands of brave men who in the role of explorers will themselves believe in the value of their labors. As long as there are such men, as long as they can obtain from private or governmental sources the means to equip themselves for the journey, and as long as the people through lack of active interest take no position antagonistic to the project, Arctic exploration will go on. And while it is generally admitted that even the most successful journey would fail to bring to light anything of value to the world in general, the zeal with which the Pole is sought is a fresh evidence of the readiness with which men in these days will meet any danger in the search for a few mysterious and well-guarded facts.

DISSIPATING THE NEGRO VOTE.

A dispatch the other day briefly noted a movement in Alabama to reduce if not altogether extinguish the colored vote without in the least violating the fifteenth amendment or recourse to any methods which statutory law or recognized customs forbid. More elaborate accounts by mail show the scheme to be as ingenious as any that ever was devised, having in view the circumventing of the law while maintaining its form and semblance, and these have been quite numerous in the sunny South since the practical application of the changes wrought by the constitutional amendments.

It seems that a few days ago, in the Alabama house of representatives, Mr. Brewer introduced a bill providing that all persons in that state whose state and county taxes amount to $5 annually, shall not be required to pay the same provided it be shown that such person failed to vote at the previous August and November elections. There is not 20 per cent of negro voters in a majority of the Southern states who pay taxes exceeding $5 per capita annually. It is believed at the lowest calculation fifty per cent of the negro voters would take advantage of an opportunity to save $5 or a less amount, should this bill become a law. It is computed from authoritative sources that of the 800,000 votes in Alabama about 136,000 or more belong to the negroes. If Mr. Brewer's ideas of legislation should prevail, Alabama would have practically wiped out its negro vote. This inspires the Chicago Dupatch to observe that "Mr. Brewer ought to find a remedy for Democratic hardships in Alabama on some plan more in harmony with the spirit of constitutional liberty; his 'friendship' for the negro will hardly be credited at par in northern circles until he elevates his statesmanship to this plane."

By one means or other it seems the Southerners are determined not only to be the ruling power but exclusively such; and perhaps it is as well that the negro make a little money out of the election in a legal way, since it is quite apparent that he is not likely to ever make anything else.

A BOOM FOR BEAVER.

A private letter from a gentleman residing in Beaver City conveys the information that that community is figuratively turned upside down over the recent mineral discoveries there; and what he says is but confirmatory of what has been told by others from that quarter. The latest excitement is over the finding of gold-bearing ore in the Indian creek, a little stream in the northern part of the county, and it is only necessary to say that the "And" is genuine so far as it goes; to what extent that may be can of course be determined only by actual development, and the season may operate somewhat against active operations just now. The writer looks for a bustling time in that neighborhood with the opening of spring, and his premises seems to be well founded.

Gold mining on "Old Baldy," as a great mountain which overshadows Beaver Valley is called—has been carried on with tolerable profit for some time. The eminence is so precipitous, however, and the scene of operations is so near the top, that the work has not attained the magnitude that would have characterized it had the mines been more accessible; this obstacle will not be present in the new fields, nor will there be any serious detriment in the way when once a good start is had, so far as we can learn.

Beaver county is already in possession of one of the greatest sulphur mines in the world, the product of which is equal to any and is being shipped in large quantities every day. As the home of the great Horn Silver mine, and many other silver, lead and copper properties, it would seem as if the only thing needed to make their principal town a metropolis is a railroad, and this cannot be denied it much longer. We can all afford to rejoice in Beaver's prosperity.

A DANGEROUS PAIR.

The state of Maine has a Jean Valjean in the person of the outlaw Nadeau. A United States marshal got after him near Aroostook not long ago, and met with such a reception that the right of way on all public highways has been awarded Nadeau by common consent ever since. A reward is offered for his apprehension, but the people are either quite independent and not at all in need of money up that way, or don't believe in obtaining it in that manner; perhaps, however, like the man and the bear, they haven't lost any outlaws of late and have no need to go in search of them.

Nadeau is a smuggler, who has established the doctrine of free trade in a practical way over the Canadian border. The government on this side would like to have him the best kind, and it cannot be said that he gives them no opportunities; but, from whatever cause, the powers that be are not supporting him yet and probably will not for some time to come. He is assisted in his nefarious work by his brother, who is almost as much a desperado as himself; certainly, the risks they jointly run at times go to show that neither is in the least afflicted with nervousness. A constant watch with a portable arsenal is kept up at home or on the road; and when an unwelcome caller comes along he is given a warning to come no nearer than he is and a reasonable time within which to retrace his steps, which so far has been done with remarkable uniformity.

The brothers are not destitute of generosity by any means, nor are they at all discriminating regarding whom they confer it upon. A few days ago they went to Moose River settlement to do some trading, one standing guard as usual while the other ran the business department. When in the outskirts they found a teamster with a broken down cart and at once Nadeau sent him in for some blacksmith's tools. The driver returned with about half the adult male population along with him. The brother, with gun cocked, advanced to meet the squad and requested them in his bluntest tones to halt, which they then and there immediately did; he then drew a line in the road fifty paces from the wagon, and said nothing more, but the crowd knew what that line meant, at least none of them crossed it. Meantime the outlaw worked away at the wagon as coolly as if he were not performing before a good-sized audience. When the work was finished the teamster was sent on his way rejoicing, the crowd walked sheepishly back from whence they came and the brothers faded into the woods.

The most lurid of our cheap literature could scarcely contain anything excelling this incident, or, for that matter, several incidents in the career of the Nadeaus. The reward for them has probably been increased by this time, and it is idle to suppose that the tolls will not be drawn about then sooner or later. While the general defenses of these men do not rank with the grosser crimes, involving, perhaps, less of moral turpitude than the majority of mademen's, they are still contrary to law and the government cannot tolerate them. To interpose an act of generosity or a dash of romance with the routine procedure now and then makes it more readable, but does not abate its criminal character one jot.

A SENSITIVE PEOPLE.

A few days since the News made the remark that it was a long time between crises in France, the last one being two or three years old; for a nation in which these political ruptures have occurred almost periodically, this was regarded as something worthy of comment. The additional point was noted that our mercurial fellow was noted in possession of a futuristic national scandal and the thought occurred that this was perhaps mitigating the dull, aching void. Following closely upon the development of the scandal came the suicide of Baron Reinach, and as we all know that for self-destruction the average Parisian is without a model and without a shadow, that it is in fact a species of mania over there, it then only needed the cabinet crisis to round out the situation, to complete the political and social triangle of turbulence, so it were. Well, we didn't have to wait long for the completion. Yesterday, in the chamber of deputies, the prime minister saw fit to interpret demand from a member as a want of confidence in the government and plucked on the regular order of the day in opposition, in which posture he was not sustained. The next thing in order was for the ministry to withdraw in a body, which they did in good order; they then wrote out their resignations and proceeding to the President's headquarters handed the documents to him. The resignations were accepted, leaving the country without a cabinet for the time being; and this is a crisis.

The French are a very sensitive people. Whether it is this quality that makes them so willing to fight at the "drop of a hat," and to fight so desperately when they get at it, or not, we don't know. It is a certain thing, however, that the unearthing of a great scheme for systematic public plunder is taken to heart in France more than such a thing is anywhere else, especially in our country. The discovery by the chamber that the French nation and people had been and were being preyed upon by a set of sharpers acting in the guise of promoters of a great enterprise is resented, and instantly the whole people are agitated as nothing short of a declaration of war could do it; a banker who is shown to have been implicated in the business poisons himself and dies, presumably through shame but perhaps also because of fear of the enraged populace; and the discussion of this event and concomitant circumstances in the national legislature bring about the overthrow of the governmental ministry. We repeat, they are the most sensitive people on earth; and when the cause of their present agitation is considered, why shall we not also say that they are among the most honest and honorable?

The originator of the Panama canal scheme—M. De Lesseps—has attained the very advanced age of eighty-eight years, and up to the development of the existing trouble no scandal ever attached to his public or private life. He is the father of a large family, to all of whom, and his wife, he is most devotedly attached. His inspirational conception and masterly execution of the great Suez canal project was a source of fame and profit sufficient to have satisfied most men, but he could not rest with that. The American continent must be cleft in twain and the route to the Orient be shortened even more than that to India through his masterful work. He now finds himself confronted by criminal proceedings. Let us hope for humanity's sake alone that these will not be pushed. He has done enough for his country and mankind to entitle him to some lenity even if he should have been compromised by the guilty work of others; and certainly no one who knows the man will believe for a moment that one whose aims in life were so grand and whose walk was so upright would or could stoop to personal dishonesty. There may be some more suicides and there is no doubt that some men in high places are in a sad state of trepidation, but it would be too bad to find this grand Frenchman figuring in either category.

DESCERATING SOLDIERS' GRAVES.

A good deal of indignation is being felt and expressed at the accounts which have been sent out of desecration of Union soldiers' graves in two counties of Indiana. It seems that immediately after the Presidential election the headstones of some of those graves were smeared with red paint, the motive ascribed being to celebrate Cleveland's election in a manner satisfying to that branch of the Democratic party that still holds to the righteousness of the doctrine of secession; the act itself is attributed to the Knights of the Golden Circle, a secret society opposed to the war, which was organized during the struggle, but is not presumed to have continued long after.

We cannot believe that Democrats as such would commit an outrage of that kind any more than we could believe as such they would commit murder, arson or burglary. It would be a sad commentary upon our free institutions if it could be shown that they were productive of an organization powerful enough to control the government through an enormous preponderance of the people's votes and criminal enough to desecrate or defile the sleeping places of the honored dead. Such acts may have been committed by Democrats, as many other crimes have been. A Democrat assassinated a President of the United States, and a few years later a Republican did the same thing; but it does not follow that one was a Democratic and the other a Republican assassination by any means. They were simply murders, of which neither party was aware beforehand, and at whose consummation both were filled with horror and dismay.

The man or men who would commit so degraded and brutal an act as mutilating the grave of any human being, except for some lawful purpose, is not fit to rank as either Democrat or Republican—designations which have been proudly and honorably worn by the best and bravest in the land. No matter what such persons may call themselves politically or otherwise, they are simply human hyenas, devoid of human sensibilities or moral restraints. In such cases detection should be certain and punishment swift and unerring; the longest term of imprisonment which the law will permit should be their portion.

NOT ALL SUNSHINE.

A fair idea of the extent to which a newly elected President is persecuted by patriots willing to serve their country in an official way, may be gained from the recent action of Mr. Cleveland in fleeing to Virginia. On a quiet island in a modest lake, with gun in hand and equipped cap-a-pie in hunting armor, he warily waits the advent of the canvas-back, the spoonbill and the other varieties of duck indigenous to the Old Dominion, and forgets for the nonce that he is the chosen of sixty-five millions of people and that there is an office-seeker in the land. As Mrs. Cleveland and baby Ruth have joined him in his exile, it is fair to presume that he is going to give the gentry spoken of a good, long wait.

It is all very well for him while the exclusion from mankind is kept up; but we greatly fear it is like shutting the door upon one wolf only to be surrounded by the ravenous animals after awhile. He is not "pestered" at all now, but the mails are in active operation all the while and those who would have office necessarily know how to write; he must find it a laborious task to dispose of his correspondence when he does so as it comes along, but what will he do with the mountainous heap that will have accrued during his sojourn and his marsh? It won't do to neglect any part of it; business men always read every letter and Mr. Cleveland is strictly a business man; and it looks as though his vacation will have been taken at the expense of a herculean task when he returns. He is capable of a great deal of work and is not afraid of it; furthermore, he is quite familiar with the onerous requirements of his lofty station, so that he will not be so completely overwhelmed as a beginner might when contemplating a few thousand letters to be read and many of them answered.

If it should by any manner of means happen to come Mrs. Lease's way, would she be called Senatrix or Senatrix?

THE "SUN" SHINES ASKANT.

Peering the books and finding out where the balances are and in whose favor, is the regular pastime of most political newspapers for a long time after an important and exciting contest. "Why It Was" is a stereotyped heading on such occasions; and the inventive ingenuity which that subject develops is really wonderful at times. The recent earthquake was a little too stupendous a performance to be disposed of with mere words and fanciful figuring, but it is receiving the customary attention nevertheless. The New York Sun shows how the Empire state is, as she has been since the war, the pivotal one, never going in favor of either party in two successive elections, all of them in leap years as follows:

1864.	Republican.
1868.	Democratic.
1872.	Republican.
1876.	Democratic.
1880.	Republican.
1884.	Democratic.
1888.	Republican.
1892.	Democratic.

New York has oscillated impartially between the two political parties for twenty-eight years, says the Sun. "The victors of one presidential election have been overthrown in the succeeding one; the defeated of one contest have triumphed four years later. The result of this year's battle strengthens and clinches the sanguine expectations of the Republicans that they will win in New York in 1896. Perhaps they will, and certainly no one will begrudge them, in the heyday of a glorious Democratic victory, such harmless consolation as they can extract from this reassuring circumstance."

Without meaning to be captious, it is necessary to point out that the New York luminary is not sufficiently exact in its language. The victors of one presidential election have not always been overthrown in the succeeding one, notwithstanding New York's oscillation in favor of the rule. That the great state went Democratic in 1868 did not prevent General Grant, as a Republican, from being elected as successor to Lincoln and Johnson, who were also elected by the Republican party; and that its electoral vote in 1876 was given to Tilden, the Democratic nominee, did not prevent Hayes from being inaugurated (whether fairly elected or not) as the Republican successor of General Grant. The only part of the Sun's rule which appears to be good for anything is that in presidential years the Empire state alternates between the parties. The inference which that paper would draw—that as New York goes so goes the Union—is seen to have been unquestionable wrong once within the time named and in effect twice; and it is likely to be still more frequently wrong in the future. If recent events are of value as a basis for future calculation, New York will soon cease to be in any degree pivotal.

Harry McKay, the man who confessed himself guilty of repeating at the recent election in Boise City has been sentenced to two years' imprisonment in the state penitentiary.

RELIGIOUS.

Sunday Services.

Religious services were held at the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Sunday, November 20th, 1892, commencing at 2 o'clock p. m., President Angus M. Cannon presiding.

The choir sang the hymn:

God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform.

Prayer by Elder James P. Freeze.

The choir sang the anthem:

God of Israel.

The Priesthood of the Seventeenth ward officiated in the administration of the Sacrament.

ELDER JOHN NICHOLSON

was then requested to address the audience. He felt, he said, his own inefficiency, but asked for the attention, sympathy and faith of his hearers, in order that he might be enabled to say that which is appropriate to the occasion.

One of the reasons why we assemble as this afternoon is to show that we remember the Savior, by partaking of the Sacrament. To do so with clean hands and pure hearts we must be pure in feelings and sentiments. There should be no feeling of unkindness to anybody, and least of all to those of the same faith. Before coming here we should therefore rid ourselves of all that is detrimental to our full union with one another. If we prepare ourselves we shall feel blessed.

The speaker now read from the sixth verse, ninth chapter, 2nd Nephi, Book of Mormon, in regard to what the Son of God has done for the redemption of mankind. Christ, he continued, by His atonement, brought to pass the resurrection of man, so that as all have sinned, so all through His work shall rise to life again and have the benefit of the experience they have gained on earth. It is difficult to explain the reasons of the great work before us from any other standpoint.

There is a tendency among the people of the world to deny revelation and some are growing up in our own midst with the same ideas. They ask for philosophical reasons for the doctrines preached and will not accept revelation alone. Now, this desire for reasons will no doubt sooner or later be gratified, for truth can be explained. It has been admitted that our Elders have not had much difficulty in establishing their doctrines according to revelation, for they are founded on truth and are in accord with sound philosophy; as President Brigham Young used to say, the Gospel is philosophy. It is true, even if it had never been revealed to man. There have been barriers to giving a reasonable ground for the doctrine of atonement, but these were depending on misunderstandings concerning the origin and existence of man. For ages it has been taught that the beginning of man is his first appearance on this planet. There is a general admission of the duality of man—his existence as a spirit in the mortal tabernacle. On this point there is not much controversy. But regarding the existence of the spirit before the body the ideas are not so clear. Yet, the scriptures are not uncertain on the subject. Jeremiah, for instance, is said to have been selected to be a prophet of the Lord previous to his coming into the world. Christ existed before He came to the earth, for He says he was before Abraham. Such statements are numerous, although they are not generally accepted even by religionists. The question now is, is it reasonable to suppose that man had a pre-existence? which question the speaker answered in the affirmative. It is the most reasonable theory to hold. Everything points to this—the intelligence of man which has enabled him to perform the great wonders which surround us, wonders that do not only belong to the nineteenth century but every age and every race of man. Witness the remarkable collections contained in the great museums of the world. In this age we have the accumulation of thought and intelligence of all the preceding ages; this is what gives us the advantage over them.

Now, are these wonderful achievements the result of the experience gained by man only during the short span of life allotted to him on earth? The speaker thought not, for that would be contrary to the law of development, which regulates everything in nature. The most reasonable conclusion is that all this is the consequence of our anterior experience and not a leap all at once into this remarkable excellence of intelligence. It also accords with the announcement made by Joseph Smith, the great prophet of this century, who told us by revelation from God that all things were first created spiritually. It was necessary that spirit and element should come together that there might be a fullness of joy. It appears also to have been necessary that man should transgress in order that the law of his previous existence should be violated and man find himself in the position in which he now is. But this again made it necessary that there should be an atonement whereby divine justice should be satisfied. And, as Nephi says, it must be a divine atonement, for no other would cover the ground. Man had exhausted his resources, he could not redeem himself; therefore it must be the atonement of one on whom death and hell had no claim. On us death had claim, but not on Him. Being an infinite atonement, it covers the whole of the human race and makes it possible for all to derive eternal benefits therefrom. Now it is clear that if there is no pre-existence of the human race, the atonement cannot be explained. The two doctrines are in perfect harmony with each other and with the whole system of true theology.

If we comprehend this we believe in it and find it easy, comparatively, to follow Christ who has brought this great atonement. He laid Christ laid His life down for us, a fact that makes it appropriate that we should give our devotion to Him, by keeping His commandments. This is true repentance. When we become convinced that we are not living in conformity to the law of God we reform; we cease to do that which is wrong and do what is told us by the Lord is right. This is the nature of repentance and is illustrated in the parable of the prodigal, who returned to his father, although he felt he was not worthy to be called son any more. But the father was forgiving and there was joy in the home when the prodigal returned. So we have the promise, when we repent, our sins will be forgiven. Here then is the atonement, faith and repentance.

Now, when a human being resolves to follow Christ, and the Lord accepts him, there is an act instituted appropriate to the covenant into which the Lord and the repentant person have entered. This act is baptism for the remission of sins. How beautiful this ordinance is if rightly understood. Some seem to think that this ordinance is too simple to be of divine origin, but its very simplicity is in full harmony with the whole plan of salvation. It is so planned that no one is excluded from it. It is as acceptable to the highest capacity as it is within the reach of the simplest mind. In this act Christ is present through His agents, for it must be administered by an authorized servant of the Lord so be blessing. This is clearly taught by the Word of God, in the history of John the Baptist, for instance, by whom Jesus was baptized, after which He received the Holy Ghost and the testimony that He was the Son of God. If it was not beneath Him, who had left the throne of glory, to submit to this ordinance, it should certainly not be beneath our dignity to observe it.

Speaking of the resurrection of Christ, Elder Nicholson observed that the body of the Savior was freed from mortality. When a candidate for salvation goes down into the water, he comes out free from sin, as Christ came forth from the grave free from all that was corruptible—the symbol of beauty. Those who obeyed the Gospel in foreign lands—will never forget the moment when they went down into the waters of baptism and took upon themselves the name of Latter-day Saint. Even the man himself who administered the ordinance is remembered with gratitude by the Saints.

When the individual is free from his sin he is in a position to receive the Holy Spirit, for it is the promise of the Lord that He shall be given to those who have been baptized for the remission of sins. The Spirit is given through the ordinance of laying on of hands by the Elders authorized to do so.

There is abundant testimony among the Saints to the truth of the Gospel. Thousands can testify to the reception of the Holy Ghost in accordance with the promise, no matter whether people choose to believe it or not. The Saints know that they have received the Spirit and no contradiction can alter the fact any more than persecution could alter the fact that Paul saw a light and heard the voice of the Savior on the road to Damascus. When a person has received the Spirit of God he no longer belongs to the world but to the Kingdom of the Lord. And if he continue faithful to the end, he shall finally receive an entrance into the celestial kingdom.

The Spirit of God like a fire is burning.

7. Woman's Sphere.

By One of the Sex.

I don't think there is a section of country in the United States that has so many busy women as has this fair Territory of ours. I have wondered a little at this, but on thorough reflection I have come to the conclusion that much of it is due to the large proportion of Yankee descendants in the Territory. Most of our leaders and the founders of this were of Puritan descent, and true to the traditions of their fathers and mothers, our people are exceedingly busy. We are not, however, busy as our grandmothers were busy, and the question has arisen, what are we all busy about?

THE BUSY GIRL.

If you meet our girls on the street, at a party, or call to see them, each and every one of them will tell you she is so busy that she cannot find a moment to—, yes—, to what? One girl tells you she is so busy she can't find time to call and see you. That is apt to be the girl who, if her school days are over, is a member of one or two clubs or associations, who has to attend to the buying and planning of her dresses, and who is so overworked with the arrangement of her own wardrobe that she has small time to do anything else. Another type is the girl who has more than time enough to call and see you, but who is so occupied calling and seeing you and her other friends that she has not a moment to spare to write to an absent friend, or to mend her own stockings. Another girl is so busy going out into "society" that she has no time for visiting, writing, or mending. And yet any one of these girls will have plenty of time to stand on the street corner and talk with you for an hour or two; or she will perhaps yawn or sigh over some novel a whole afternoon; or she will have hours of time to spend in parading up and down the principal street in the town, to see and be seen, and if the girls have plenty of time to spend in pastimes that some of us would call waste of time, how is it with the married women?

THE BUSY YOUNG WIFE.

Oh yes, she is exceedingly busy. She has a "whole house to keep," and that means three meals a day for John and herself, and then, of course, there are all her fancy things to make and arrange; she has to drape her pictures and walls, and she will tell you that she "don't understand how it is that some people can run out and gossip"—she never has a minute. Why, it takes her a whole day to dust and arrange her little parlor. And so you excuse her from calling, or writing, or attending the Y. L. M. L.—she is so terribly busy.

THE BUSY MOTHER.

Well, yes, any one can see that a mother is busy. But, as an ordinary onlooker, I have been unable to see any difference in the comparative "busyness" of a mother with one child and the mother of thirteen children. I have tried to solve this riddle, and have at last done so on the broad general principles which will transpire in the course of this chat on busy women. The mother of one tottler will spend hours of time dressing, making dresses for her baby, playing with it and showing it off to her friends. Of course, she is what she calls busy. Every moment of her time from six or seven o'clock in the morning until ten or eleven at night is filled with worry and work, or rather employment. The mother of twelve, if she be housewife, seamstress, cook, nurse, and mother certainly seems to have enough not only to occupy her but to keep her exceedingly busy. But, is there one way whereby even her cares can be lessened? I think so, and usually such a mother has had to work out for herself the problem that is just now occupying our weekly time for chat.

As a sort of finger board, to that desired end, let me point out to the seeking mother that if she is and will be the mother of little heavenly emigrants, much of the condition of her life will rest upon the way in which she manages her baby. How can you manage a baby? Asks a mother in despair! Don't the babies always manage us? Again I answer, I think not, not always. But we will discuss that point some other week. Meanwhile, let me remark in passing that the mother who has one or a dozen babies, and the youngest of them in her arms night and day is dragging away at her life and vitality in the night through constant nursing, and who fills every moment of her waking hours with baby demands for cake, candy, rocking, carrying about in the arms, and riding in the baby carriage such a mother is, I admit it with profound pity, indeed infinitely busy. Again, is it necessary? Again I answer, I think not.

THE BUSY CHILDLESS WIFE.

Indeed, my friend, these good sisters of ours are often as busy and as little able to spend a half hour in writing you a letter, or in attending a meeting as are the mothers of a dozen children. And what do they do? Oh, there are of course meals to get, dishes to wash, or if they keep a girl, they are taking lessons in something, or they are knitting antimaccassars, or crocheting lace which requires ten days' time to make and is worth forty cents. Or they are reading a wonderful novel by the Duchess, or perhaps, God bless such, they are officers in some of our Women's Associations and have many little odds and ends of duties to perform in that calling of theirs. Any way, they, too, are undeniably busy.

THE GRANDMOTHERS.

And are they busy, too? I must say, that the most of the women I know over sixty are even busier than are their daughters who are raising children. Usually among our people the grandmothers are active members of the Relief Society. If they are not that, some of them in our Temple districts are Temple workers, and those who have not this privileged are busy making quilts, helping Jane and Mary with their children, or spending their time in some quiet occupation which perfectly engrosses them.

Take any class or style of woman question her and she will invariably answer she is so busy she don't know what to do with herself. And now, is there any little lesson for us in all this talk of ours. Let me answer again, I think so. In the first place, will any of you take the time to ask yourselves, What am I busy at? What is the main object of my life? To what am I giving my life and strength? How many hours am I spending in the real business of life, and how many am I filling with trifling occupations? I am afraid if even the busy mother of twelve children could carefully consider and then answer that question her conscience would smite her, and she would find an opportunity for a much-needed reform.

Girls, be sure your associations are of the highest, your books of the noblest, and your visits to the purest men. Wives, see to it that your work is that which will improve your mind, your tidies not too numerous, and your pretty things not of too useless a character. Mothers, be sure that you are not bringing up a lot of indulged, weak-livered, empty-headed children. Do not waste hours of time in nursing baby under the impression that you are "bringing up your family." Women, sisters, let us count out our moments as if they were precious small jewels that will have to be guarded and rendered up to the great owner of them all. If we waste time gossiping, reading trash, rocking babies, making piles of useless fancy work, or in any sort of useless play, shall we not at once repent and turn over a new leaf? I believe in turning over the new leaf when we grow conscious that the old one is soiled, not in waiting for New Year's Day, or any particular day.

Do you remember what President Woodruff told us was the condition of things in the other world? I do; every one he met was so busy they could hardly take time to speak to him. "The whole heavens were busy." That is it, then, the spirit of "busyness" is in the air; it comes to us from the hosts of heaven. Are our works worthy of us?

Address:

MRS. FRANCES M. RICHARDS, Care DESERT NEWS,
Salt Lake City, Utah.

The Queen's Lady Attendants.

From the N. Y. Sun—One of the difficulties of Mr. Gladstone's administration thus far seems to be the difficulty of supplying maids-in-waiting to the Queen. Superior inducements have been offered in the way of higher salary, but no applicants have been found for a position once eagerly coveted. A writer who signs herself "Lady-in-waiting" has recently been setting forth the duties of maids of honor. By comparison it seems that cooks and housemaids have superior places, even if these are not so remunerative. The Queen's maids of honor get up early and await their summons from the Queen. When they enter the royal presence they are greeted by a brief but kindly good morning as Jane, Adeline or Martha, as the case may be. The first duty is to read the newspapers to her Majesty. This service exacts a carefully modulated voice, and lasts two or three hours. At 2 o'clock the Queen lunches, and the maids are released to join the household at luncheon. It was with the household and these duchesses and honorable ladies-in-waiting that it will be remembered young Jesse Grant refused to dine. No persuasions could induce Jesse "to dine with the servants," and another cover had to be set at the royal table for Young America. These ladies, as one or the other may be on special duty, accompany the Queen on her daily drive. Immediately after the reading begins, or the maids arrange photographs—this seems to be some special sort of occupation—or finish bits of needlework of which the Queen has grown tired. At length the Queen goes to dress for her 9 o'clock dinner, and the ladies-in-waiting are allowed to go to their own dinner.

The ladies of the bed chamber write many of the Queen's letters, do her shopping, and make visits on the people whom she wishes to show attention, and make themselves entertaining generally. The Queen, it is said, when younger, was lively in private, and the ladies would dance reels and play games for her amusement. Life in the palace is now a more serious duty. While the Queen wears her own clothes to shabbiness, she desires to see her ladies well dressed, and is particular about the color and cut of their garments. The wages of the ladies-in-waiting and the bed-chamber women are $1500 for their thirteen weeks of service, and scarcely pays for their clothes. The Mistress of the Robes, who is the dean of the corps, and never less a person than a dowager duchess, gets $2500 a year. This same writer says that of late years the Queen has grown capricious in her likes and dislikes. She will weary of a face, the sound of a voice will jar, or a mannerism displease. It then becomes some one's duty to inform the unfortunate lady that her resignation would be acceptable. In any case, this service demands for the time all independence of speech, manner, or even thought. When the Queen weeps they must be melancholy, admire when she admires, always say the right thing at the right time, and, above all, never show fatigue. To a disinterested person it does not seem strange that these places, that do not seem to differ greatly from household service on this side of the water, should go a begging.

Heartology.

A writer in the New York Recorder tells of a science which looks to women and the future for a perfect development. Colonel Booth of the Salvation Army, in eulogizing his mother, the late Mrs. General Booth, said that she was a student in the science of heartology. A moment's reflection shows that this is an excellent word with which to describe the simple yet powerful science which is to solve the most difficult problems of church and state. Heartology holds no place in the university curriculum, but in the college settlement of New York it has a foothold. The professor of heartology would teach that truth is the underlying principle of the science. There might be a table of weights and measures to show the commensurate values of kind words and cruel ones, the importance of an encouraging smile and applications of the golden rule.

When this great principle is fully put into practice throughout the world, people will realize the fallacy of prisons as a specific for crime. The boys in reform schools will grow tractable through the influence of loving arms put about them and the weak and fallen will be uplifted by the heart-to-heart work of purer lives than theirs. As expounders of heartology women are rapidly coming to the front, for the world needs their maternal thoughtfulness and warm hearts.

Chinese Women.

Position of the Chinese women is very much misunderstood. There is a Chinese upper circle, limited in number, who live secluded lives. The mass of Chinese women are abroad. They are on the roads, in the fields, performing their duties wherever these may happen to be. The most accomplished women of business to be found anywhere are in Hong Kong. These women carry on large transactions. There is a class called Compadores—the spelling of this word is according to its sound. These women fit out ships, furnish them in every part, or store them with supplies. The old-time sailing masters would employ the same women year after year. The Compadores were so clever in business that no sailor man could contend against them. It was easier to yield to one than to run the risk of finding another, who might be still more acute. The Chinese women are as strong bodily as they are alert with their brains. In a voyage up the river breakfast was delayed. The captain said his wife was not feeling well, but would be on deck presently. Presently she came, bringing with her a passenger nobody had seen before. It was a new baby. This she laid on a piece of cork. A rope way tied around the body, and baby and cork were chucked overboard. The cork kept it from floating off. The gentle wake of the sandpan, as the boat was called.

Royal Ladies Getting Old.

It is announced that both King Humbert of Italy and his queen have greatly aged during the last two or three years. The once coal-black hair and the moustache of the king have become snow-white, while the former lovely and captivating Queen Marguerite has not only become stout, but has also lost most of her elegance, grace and good looks. Her features have become accentuated in an unpleasant manner, and it is to be feared that she will develop into an extremely homely old woman, similar in fact, to her exceedingly unpopular mother, the dowager duchess of Genoa, who is the most unpopular member of the entire Italian royal family. The loss of her beauty must be exceedingly bitter to Queen Marguerite.

For the past 20 years she has always been accustomed to hear and see herself described as the most beautiful, graceful and altogether charming occupant of any royal or imperial throne. Hardly ever has her name appeared in print either at home or abroad without some qualifying adjective of an exceedingly complimentary nature being appended thereto. All this she is likely to miss henceforth. Another royal lady who has aged terribly of late is the Princess of Wales, who is dependent to a greater extent than most people believe upon the assistance of posticher of one kind and another. Her hair is not hers, neither is her figure, nor yet her complexion, and the contrast between her artificial appearance in public and her natural appearance when in the privacy of her own apartments, must be very sad.

How to Be Happy.

In one of Thackeray's letters some excellent advice on this point is as follows: "For my own part, I know of nothing more contemptible, unmanly or unwomanly and craven than the everlasting sighing for 'happiness.' Those who have the most of it think the least about it. But in the thinking about and doing their duty, happiness comes—because the heart and mind are occupied with earnest thought that touches at a thousand points the beautiful and sublime realities of the universe. The heart and mind are brought—and reverently, be it said—in all—the perfect bliss. Again, with leisure; it is a very pleasant garment to look at, but a very bad one to wear. The ruin of thousands—aye, millions, may be traced to it."

What Old Maids Are.

A recent writer thus gracefully defines maiden ladies: "The undelivered packages at the express office. They were originally intended for somebody, but the parties to whom they were addressed have never appeared, or else they had the wrong address, or the address somehow got obliterated. Often very valuable parcels, which would have given great joy if they had been delivered to the proper consignee."—Demorest's Magazine.

It's a sweet and tiny treasure,

Things Good to Eat.

Potato puffs: Two cups mashed potatoes, cold or hot, two eggs, three tablespoonful of butter, salt and pepper to taste. Put the potatoes in a frying-pan, add the yolks of the eggs, cream and seasoning; stir over the fire until hot. Take from the fire, add carefully the wellbeaten whites of the eggs. Heap on a greased baking-dish or in gem-pans. Bake in quick oven until a nice brown.

Sauce cake: One cup brown sugar, one-half cup molasses, one tablespoonful cinnamon, one cup thick, sour cream, one teaspoonful soda, one tablespoonful allspice, 3/4 cups flour, one pound of raisins. Seed and chop the raisins, dissolve the soda in a tablespoonful of hot water, add it to the molasses, then add the cream, sugar and flour, beat well, add spices and the raisins well floured. Bake in a moderate oven one hour.

Sauce cake: One cup of sour cream, one and three-quarter cups of flour, one cup of sugar, one-half teaspoonful cloves, two eggs, one-half teaspoonful cloves, two eggs, one-half teaspoonful cinnamon, one-half teaspoonful soda (even). This makes a thin batter, but baked in a quick oven is a very nice cake.

Things Worth Knowing.

Tomatoes or lemon juice make bad stain, often upon one's clothing. This discoloration can be easily and entirely removed by washing in a weak solution of ammonia.

The season is just beginning for chapped hands, with all their discomforts. If a little borax is added to the wash-water much is done to prevent them.

Nothing is more beneficial to the hair than daily and vigorous brushing, but this entails a sadly soiled hairbrush, very few days. If the brush is dipped in ammonia water and then dried in the sun it will come out as good as new.

The ordinary "gossamer" is the ugliest and most unbecoming of woman's ornaments. Whalebones which have become bent or misshapen can be made "as good as new" by soaking them a few hours in water and then drying them.

There are more than 4,000,000 seamen in the world, with 3,000,000 of families directly connected with them. The commerce of the United States employs 500,000 sailors, in 65,000 deep sea vessels, and 50,000 American born seamen are members of Christian churches. On more than 500 vessels Christian services are held each week.

More than 100,000 sailors in the ports of civilized nations are wide open for their destruction, while in all the world there are hardly 100 bethells for their salvation. More than 300,000 during the last eight years in our country have been induced to sign the temperance pledge. Nearly 1,000,000 sailors arrived at and departed from the ports of the United States the last year, mostly of foreign birth.

The origin of the best known sailors' hymns is interesting, most of them being produced after perilous experiences at sea. Perhaps no hymn is more sung on the water than Charles Wesley's, beginning,

"Jesus, lover of my soul."

It was written in 1740, shortly after Wesley's return from America to England, and during the first stormy scenes of his itinerant preaching. Whether the figures in the first stanza were suggested by the storms of the Atlantic, which the writer had but recently encountered, or by the storms of human passion, we cannot say. But most of the sea hymns of Charles Wesley were but the unfoldings of actual experiences.

Bishop Heber's matchless hymn beginning,

"When through the torn sail
The wild tempest is streaming," was written after similar experiences. The bishop took an affectionate interest in the humblest sailors during his voyages. "Only to think," said a grateful seaman, "of such a great man as the bishop coming between deck to pray with such poor fellows as we."

About 120 years ago, there wandered among the palm groves of Sierra Leone, a young Englishman who had fallen so low as to be shunned even by the rude traders on the coast, and by the African slaves. He had little clothing; he went hungry, and often was obliged to subsist upon roots. His life was not only stained with vice, but with viciousness in its most disgusting forms. He had a pious mother, and the memory of her counsels and prayers, like good angels, followed him in all of his wanderings. Escaping at last from the coast, he secured a passage for England.

During the homeward voyage the ship encountered a terrible storm. "I began to pray," he said. "I could not utter the prayer of faith. My prayer was like the cry of the ravens, which yet the Lord does not disdain to hear." The storm subsided, but the young man, sick at last of sin, continued to pray. God revealed his salvation to him on the ocean, and out of this deep experience came the sailor's hymn, beginning,

"I hear the tempest's awful sound,
I feel the vessel's quick rebound;
And fear might now my bosom fill,
But Jesus tell me, 'Peace! be still!'"

"In this dread hour I cling to thee,
My Saviour crucified for me.
If that I perish be thy will,

In death, Lord, whisper, 'Peace! be still!'"

That young man was John Newton, the rector of St. Woolnoth, London, the friend of Cowper and the writer of a part of the Olney hymns.

The Gospel Hymns of Bliss & Sankey relate in part to the lives and experiences of seamen.

"Pull for the shore," also by P. P. Bliss, is a popular hymn on the sea. It was suggested by the following incident in "Things New and Old":

"We watched the wreck with great anxiety. The lifeboat had been out some hours, but could not reach the vessel through the great breakers that raged and foamed on the sand-bank. The boat appeared to be leaving the crew to perish. But in a few minutes the captain and 16 sailors were taken off and the vessel went down.

"When the lifeboat came to you, did you expect it had brought some tools to repair your old ship?" I said.

"Oh, no, she was a total wreck. Two of her masts were gone, and if we had stayed mending her only a few minutes, we must have gone down, sir."

"When once off the old wreck and safe in the lifeboat, what remains for you to do?"

"Nothing, sir, but just to pull for the shore."

Still another mariners' hymn among the Gospel Hymns is:

"Let the Lower Lights be Burning," also by P. P. Bliss. On a dark stormy night, when the waves rolled like mountains and not a star was to be seen, a boat, rocking and plunging, neared the Cleveland harbor.

"Are you sure this is Cleveland?" asked the captain, seeing only one light from the lighthouse.

"Quite sure, sir," replied the pilot.

"Where are the lower lights?"

"Gone out, sir."

"Can you make the harbor?"

"We must, or perish, sir."

And with a strong hand and a brave heart the old pilot turned the wheel. But alas in the darkness he missed the channel, and with a crash upon the rocks the boat was shattered and many a life lost in a watery grave.

Still another mariners' hymn, of the gospel songs, is suggested:

"If You Cannot on the Ocean," by Philip Phillips. It was a favorite hymn of President Lincoln. The words are by Mrs. Ellen H. Gates. She says:

"The lines were written upon my slate one snowy afternoon in the winter of 1860. I knew, as I know now, that the poem was only a simple little thing, but somehow I had a presentiment that it had wings.

City Attorney Hoge presented the following, which was read and the request granted:

To the Honorable President and City Council:

I am forced to again call on your honorable body for a further appropriation of $125 in the case of Allred et al. vs. Salt Lake City, now on trial in Ogden. After consultation with Mr. Coad, my associate, and our engineer, it having come to our ears that the jury wished to visit the farm of the Alireds alleged to have been damaged by the city and believing it the proper thing for them to do get an order of court to have the jury visit the premises, and I suppose they are doing so today, as such was the order. This will entail an additional expense which must be paid on tomorrow; I therefore ask that the appropriation be made at your session this evening, that it may be available tomorrow, the marshal having advanced the expense of the trip.

THIRD READING OF ORDINANCES.

Compiler Lipman then commenced the third reading of ordinances. Chapters 1 to 4 inclusive were passed without amendment.

Chapter 5, governing the board of health, was laid on the table until Wednesday evening.

Chapter 6 was amended so as to allow a salary of $500 per annum to be paid to each member of the board of public works, instead of $250.

There was no change made in chapter 7, which treats on bonding.

Chapters 8, 9, 10 and 11 were passed without modification or amendment.

The chapter relating to the levy and collection of dog taxes was amended so as to make the tax on male dogs $2. The tax for the keeping of a female dog is $3 as heretofore.

Chapter 13, on elections, 14, on city engineer, 15, on estray pound, 16, on explosives, and 17, on fire department, were all passed without amendment.

The City Council met in regular session last night, President Loofbourrow in the chair. The members in attendance were: Horn, Blomodi, Lawson, Beardsley, Rich, Folland, Karriok, Wantland, Evans, Heise, Moran, Kelly—12.

Absent—Bell, Loofbourrow, Hardy—3.

WOULD STATE WHY PRIVATELY.

Immediately after roll call President Loofbourrow excused himself for the balance of the evening. He said he did not care to state publicly why he wished to absent himself but would do so privately to any member of the council who desired to know. He called Councilman Beardsley to the chair and left the council chamber.

THE MINUTES READ IN FULL.

The new ruling by President Loofbourrow that the minutes of all meetings should be read in full was observed and thirty minutes were thus consumed.

PETITIONS.

were read and referred as follows:

T. B. McNair and others asked for an extension of watermain. Committee on waterworks.

The board of education asked for the establishment of a number of permanent sidewalk grades. Granted.

H. Thompson and others asked to have Fifth West between Fifth and Sixth South put in passable condition. Committee on streets.

Fred Auerbach & Bro. asked to be allowed to lay their own sidewalk in front of property owned by them on Second South street. Board of public works.

L. C. Crossman and others asked for the erection of an electric light at the corner of South Temple and Eighth West streets and at the intersection of First South and Eighth West streets. Committee on improvements.

A NEW DUPLY RECORDER.

The city recorder read a communication from himself announcing the resignation of Elmer Ellsworth as deputy city recorder and the appointment of Fred W. Dennis to fill the vacancy.

Communication received and filed and the appointment confirmed.

HE WANTS FIFTY TONS.

Superintendent of Waterworks Ryan sent in a communication in which he asked that the council purchase fifty tons of six inch water pipe for his department at once. Adopted.

DANGEROUS SIDEWALKS.

Street supervisor Hines reported, recommending that the temporary sidewalks in various parts of the city which are in a dangerous condition be "sloped" so as to conform to the permanent walks so as to avoid accidents. Board of public works.

WILL HAVE LIGHT.

The committee on improvements reported favorably on the petition of G. H. Thomas and others asking for an electric light at the intersection of South Temple and Eighth West streets. Adopted.

WATERMAIN EXTENSION.

The committee on waterworks recommended the granting of the petition of Abraham H. Cannon and others for a watermain extension on Eighth West street from Ninth and Tenth South streets. Granted.

THE PROPOSED NEW FIRE STATIONS.

The committee on public grounds reported that they had selected suitable sites in the northeast and southwest parts of the city and that they had ordered deeds and abstracts for the same. Received and filed.

PLANS TO BE PROCURED.

The matter of calling for competitive plans for the new stations was referred to the committee on fire department.

THAT HOLD OVER MATTER.

The committee on elections reported as follows in the matter of the resolution of Councilman J. A. Heise, adopted November 8, with reference to certain appointed officers holding over:

After considerable inquiry we find that the following named have not been formally reappointed and are performing the duties of their respective offices just the same as before their terms expired: Sanitary Inspector Showell, appointed to serve two years from June, 1890; L. C. Haines, chairman of the board of public works, appointed in June, 1890, term expired in June, 1892; F. A. Mescham, city physician, appointed in 1892. We recommend that the matter be referred to the Mayor.

THE CUSTOMARY WRANGLE.

The customary councilmanic wrangle followed the reading of the report. There were motions and counter motions, amendments to amendments in relation to the disposition of the matter. Finally Moran moved, as a substitute, that the paper be referred to the Mayor. This motion carried and numerous attempts to defeat it.

EXTENSION OF FRANCHISES.

The Salt Lake City Railway Rapid Transit sent in a communication in which they jointly represent that contemplated street improvements would make their expenses beyond their income. For this and other reasons they asked for an extension of all franchises granted to the city for a period of twenty years. Committee on improvements.

FOLLAND'S "AUTHORITY" RESOLUTION.

Folland's resolution introduced at last meeting providing that the city supervisor only do work at the instance of a majority of the members of the street department, was on the table indefinitely.

ALSO TABLED INDEFINITELY.

Wentland made the following motion which was also laid on the table indefinitely.

That the resolution be referred to a special committee of five with a request to said committee to report to the Council a comprehensive method to be followed by all departments covering the order of material and work and approval pay rolls and vouchers.

SPEED REGULATING ORDINANCE.

An ordinance regulating the speed of teams to be driven and street cars rated across streets was read the first time and laid on the table until next meeting.

THE MAYOR'S SEWER PUMP PURCHASE VETO.

The mayor's veto of the proposed sewer pump purchase published last night in the News on Saturday evening last came up and was discussed for a full hour after which the matter was declared not properly before the Council for the reason that the mayor had failed to return the committee's report with the veto.

There was a great deal of informal discussion in the City Council last night in relation to the disposition of the city sewage and the Mayor's veto of the sewer pump purchasing proposition. The first clause of it is as follows:

"The report of the committee on sewerage recommending the acceptance of the bid of Jones & Jacobs to furnish Worthington sewer pump and plant, adopted by the Council on the 14th inst., authorizing me to close a contract with Jones & Jacobs in accordance with this bid. I respectfully decline to execute this authority.

The Mayor then proceeds to give his reasons for vetoing the matter, as published in the News on Saturday evening last. They were reviewed at length by Councilmen Lawson, Moran and Rich last night. Each of these gentlemen took strong exceptions to them. They admitted that, like his honor the Mayor, they favored the gravity system, but it would take at least two and probably three years or even more to get it in working order. The cost would range from a quarter to half a million dollars. One question was, where was the money coming from? and another was what was going to be done with the sewage in the meantime?

Rich declared that 800,000 gallons of filth was now running into the Jordan river every twenty-four hours. With the addition of the new sewage districts 1,500,000 gallons would find its way into that stream during the sultry and unhealthy months of next summer unless it could be temporarily disposed of as contemplated by the committee in recommending the purchase of the pump. The Jordan ran through the first precinct a great many people lived along its banks. Dairies were numerous in that vicinity. The cows drank water from that filthy polluted stream and the milk was sold all over the city. It would be breeding disease and death and there was no escaping it until something was done—until the gravity system was adopted.

Lawson stated that ex-Councilman Ewing had offered the city 360 acres of land over Jordan free of charge for a sewer farm until the gravity system could be established. It was near the present dumping grounds and would be a boon to the city. It would be a benefit to Mr. Ewing's land. It would be a good thing all round.

Arguments of this kind were made at length. Finally Moran took the floor and declared that there was nothing better the house and read as follows from the Mayor's veto act passed by the last Territorial Legislature:

"Every ordinance passed and every resolution adopted or contract approved by the City Council appropriating or involving the expenditure of money shall, within twenty-four hours after the action of the City Council, be presented to the Mayor for his approval; if he approve the ordinance, resolution or contract, as the case may be, he shall sign the same; if not he shall return it with his objections in writing to the city recorder, who shall present the same to the City Council at the next regular meeting thereof."

"Now then," said Moran, "the Mayor has not returned the contract or the vetoed paper of this Council—and the matter is therefore not before the house."

The chair held that Moran was correct, and the veto was laid on the table until Friday night.

During the discussion which preceded the passage of the coal ordinance passed by the City Council November 25th President Loofbourrow declared in unmistakable language that it was the duty of the council to squelch, as quickly as possible, the coal swindle that was going on in this city. He thought that it should be fought without gloves; that companies should be brought to time. That could be done by the passage of the ordinance introduced. He did not anticipate that there would be any complaint from the purchaser if he were compelled to pay five or ten cents per load for weighing by an authorized city weighmaster. He was satisfied that consumers would willingly pay for the satisfaction of knowing that they were protected. The coal combine was robbing the people on every hand. He knew how that organization was effected and for what purpose. There were five mines in the combine, owned by the Union Pacific, Sweetwater and Pleasant Valley coal companies. Prior to its formation the Union Pacific furnished about 33 1-3 per cent of the coal used in this city, the Sweetwater company from ten to twelve per cent, and the Pleasant Valley company the remainder. One of the objects of the combine was to keep up these respective proportions of sale. Under existing conditions, if a purchaser ordered Rock Springs coal he would get it providing that the sale of that kind of coal was within the limit allowed by the combine. If not, another kind of coal would be sent, but Rock Springs coal would have to be paid for. That was the status of affairs that confronted the people. The public demanded protection and the Council was in duty bound to give it to them just so far as it had the power.

The ordinance finally passed and was sent to the Mayor today. It is said that he will sign it without delay.

The ordinance provides that hereafter in the sale of coal the hundred weight shall consist of one hundred pounds avoirdupois and twenty such weights shall constitute a ton.

That every person, firm or corporation who engages in the business, in this city, of selling or delivering coal at retail or wholesale, or who sells or delivers any such coal in this city, shall deliver or cause to be delivered to the purchaser of each load or part of load of coal so sold and delivered, and at the time of such sale or delivery, a certificate in writing signed by an authorized weighmaster and also by the seller, showing the exact number of pounds of coal so delivered and whether the same is screened or un-screened.

Any person who shall violate any of the provisions of the ordinance, or who shall deliver to any purchaser a less quantity of coal than 2000 pounds avoirdupois for each ton purchased (or a proportionate amount of any part of a ton), or who shall deliver to any purchaser a less quantity of coal than that shown in such certificate, or who shall deliver to any such purchaser coal of a different kind, grade or quality or condition than that shown in the certificate accompanying such delivery, or who shall practice any fraud or deceit in the sale, weighing or delivery of any coal purchased to be delivered in this city, as aforesaid, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished for each offense by a fine in any sum not less than $20 nor more than $100, or by imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, or both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court.

Any person who, under pretense of covering the cost of weighing or delivering, shall add to the price charged for any coal sold, or to the price charged for delivery, any sum in excess of the actual cost of such weighing or delivering, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished as heretofore mentioned.

The measure is to take effect and be in force from and after its passage, approval and publication.

The City Council held an adjourned session last night. President Loofbourrow in the chair. The councilmen in attendance were: Folland, Karick, Hardy, Moran, Horn, Lawson, Evans, Kelly, Heiss, Beardsley, Wantland, Rich, Simmonds—13.

Absent—Bell—1.

TO CLEAR THE AQUEDUCT.

Watermaster Harvey reported that the North Temple street aqueduct between Main and West Temple was filled with snow and he asked for authority to remove the same so as to make a free water course. Referred to the street supervisor with power to act.

THE ALIRED CASE TO BE APPEALED.

City Attorney Hoge reported that he had consulted with the Mayor regarding the Alired damage suit in which judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $5,773.85 and that they both believed that if the case was appealed the decision would be reversed. They accordingly recommended that an appeal be taken. Adopted.

MONROE'S HOTEL AND LIQUOR LICENSE.

In the matter of granting a liquor license to Frank Monroe the committee on license reported: We understand the facts to be that the applicant has been engaged in the conducting of a theater; that said applicant contemplates erecting a hotel and carrying on a hotel business but has not yet opened said business. Your committee is of the opinion that if said applicant shall construct and conduct such building and business as under the ordinances will entitle it to be classed as a "hotel," he will be entitled to a license to carry on the sale of intoxicating liquors, notwithstanding the presence of his theater. But until such hotel is constructed and opened and proper showing of that part made he will not be entitled to receive license to sell liquor at said place. Adopted.

THE COAL ORDINANCE.

The ordinance regulating the weighing, purchase and sale of coal was read and discussed at length and passed. The measure is to take effect immediately after its passage, approval and publication.

TO PUBLISH THE CITY LAWS.

Folland offered the following, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the city recorder be and hereby is instructed to solicit bids for 250,500, 1000 and 1500 copies of city ordinances, printed on 25x38.60 pound No. 1 book paper, a. s. and c. as per following specifications: Measure of printed matter on page, 24 by 41 ems pica; body in small pica leaded, side headings in bold face brevier, ordinance titles and index in brevier. A TORNADO IN DESERET.

DESERET, Utah, Nov. 24.—About midnight last night a very heavy wind storm started here, and it lasted till break of day. It blew some hay stacks and sheds over, and in Hinckley ward, about 4 o'clock this morning, the house of Brother Ephraim Allred was blown down. Brother Allred heard it begin to crack in the back part of the house. He leaped from his bed, went to the door and as he opened it the top part of the gable end of the wall fell on him and struck him senseless. His wife got up with the baby in her arms, and no sooner had she done so than 500 pounds weight of adobies fell on the bed, going entirely through it. Another inmate of the house, by the name of Peter Brunson, from Fillmore, who was there on a visit, was also struck senseless. Part of the debris fell upon Mrs. Allred, injuring her foot badly. No sooner was the family out of the house than it collapsed, burying all their clothes. All, including six children, were left in their night clothes exposed to the cold wind, and they had to go in that condition for two miles to the house of Mr. Butler Allred, who was very kind and rendered all the assistance he could to the suffering family. As this is Thanksgiving day, they all feel to offer up their thanks for their lives and God's protecting care over them. Those who were injured are well as could be expected, their injuries not being very serious.

The roof of the house of Thomas Davies was also blown off a distance of fifty yards. Mr. Davies had to hold the bed clothing over his wife and baby, who are in a very critical condition. They are all now comfortably located in a neighbor's house.

Quite a number of other houses were slightly damaged. At break of day the snow began to fall, and the ground is now covered with a light coat of it.

I am pleased to say the health of the people is generally good; they feel well, and most of them are glad that politics is over. A few have arrived here on a duck hunt, and they intend to have a good time. D. R. GILL.

● A PRISONER'S STATEMENT.

The following has been received by Governor A. E. Thomas from H. H. Root, now serving a term in the county jail:

Governor Thomas of Utah:

Dear Sir—Last month one year ago I went to work for Mr. J. B. Stewart, dairyman. I delivered milk and collected the bills. Everything went well for a time, for I knew my business. Well, the first, second and third months he claimed was the biggest income he had ever received. The fourth and fifth months, January and February, I could not collect quite all the bills, the patrons being short. The latter part of February he began to question me and said the money wasn't coming in fast enough. I explained that as it was directly after the holidays everybody was a little short, but still he wasn't satisfied. I told him I was doing the best I could and if he was not satisfied he had better get some one else, but he didn't like the idea of my leaving.

But I will tell you the whole truth, Mr. Thomas. I was driving a young horse January and February. During the two months I had six accidents in which I lost from 150 to 175 gallons of milk and besides I replaced about 150 gallons in restaurants and hotels on account of sour milk, which I must do or lose the trade. Now, Mr. Thomas, judge for yourself, must I pay for that milk and moworking for 60 months? He has figured all that against me, we will say 300 gallons at 30 cents per gallon, or $90.

You are well aware that all business men doing business on a credit scale will lose money. This, and also the milk I lost, he figured against me, making a total of $150 months more, which would be about right counting all in. But I am $25 short in cash, which I made good this day after I turned over the books. That left me without a dollar. Then I went to work at the Metropolitan hotel for A. D. Tebin for seven weeks, when I received a letter from home stating that I had better come home at once to attend to some money matters which I had there involving $625, which was worth looking after. I didn't have enough money to go, but explained matters to my lodge (I am a third degree member of Kidgley Lodge, No. 8), and asked the loan of $25, which I got for forty days.

I then went to Dayton, O., where I live and straightened up my affairs and got my money. Then I came back to Denver. There I joined Raymond's circus, and loaned all my money to the show people, on good security. We showed here the 17th and 18th. Mr. Stewart swore out a warrant for me, of which my employers told me, and said I had better go to the car and stay there. Two weeks afterwards I was arrested in Helena and taken to prison. I didn't have time to balance the candy stand books of which I had charge. The detective wouldn't give me time to get my money. The show left the same night, and so I lost track of my $625, but it is as good as gold if I can get out of here to look after it.

I am in the worst circumstance I have ever been in my life. I owe my lodge $95, with interest, and am behind in my other dues. Otherwise I don't owe anybody on earth a cent, not excepting Mr. Stewart. Now I pray Mr. Thomas you will remit me the balance of my time so I can at least get some of my money and settle up with my lodge. I have been here since July 2nd and two months here before I was sentenced, which was for $205 or 205 days. I would pay the money if I could get it. I am sure Mr. Stewart will be satisfied, as he told me so five weeks ago. So I pray you take action on this, for I fear it will drive me mad to stay here until next May.

There is nothing against me at all, only Commissioner Pratt charged the expenses to me, which was $205 for bringing me back. I am sure the longer I am here the bigger the expense I am to the county, for I am not a good character whereas I have worked. I will close, hoping you will not act on this with the greatest of pleasure. Yours very truly,

H. H. Root.

COUNTY JAIL, Salt Lake City.

DEATH OF MRS. AGNES I. DAVIS.

Shortly before 5 o'clock on Tuesday morning last, Mrs. Agnes I. Davis, a young woman who came to this city with a sister from San Francisco a few weeks ago, died at the residence of a Mrs. Taylor, at No. 224 west Second South street, under most distressing and unfortunate circumstances. There were innumerable strange and contradictory rumors as to the cause of death. Then commenced a thorough informal investigation of the affair, which has brought forth the following version:

The Davis sisters are orphans. A little more than a year ago Agnes is said to have married a man named Davis (her dead parents' name also). It is further stated that before many weeks had elapsed after the nuptial vows had been taken he became abusive and cruel to her; that he spent the principal part of a little fortune she had been left her at the gaming table and in saloons, and other resorts frequented by men of his kind. Discovering that she would shortly become a mother, Mrs. Davis left her husband and started for Malmo, where she had relative residing. She was accompanied by her sister, Alice Davis. Arriving in Salt Lake it was found that Mrs. Davis' condition was becoming critical, and it was mutually agreed that they should remain here until after accouchement. Dr. Doggie, a graduate of the University of Berlin, whose office was across the street from where the Davis sisters were stopping, was engaged to attend Mrs. Davis, which he did. He informed her that he suspected all was not right. He advised rest and good nursing. These injunctions, it is said, were carried out faithfully. On Sunday last Dr. Doggie was again summoned and found Mrs. Davis much worse, but after giving the usual anæsthetic to alleviate her sufferings he went away and was not called until Monday, the following afternoon, at four o'clock. After making a final examination he found an unusual and very serious condition and declined to do anything with the case until another physician was summoned. Dr. Hasbrouck was called in and together they worked untidily until exhausted, but without success. The patient was under the influence of chloroform and was very weak. Dr. Bowers was sent for, but was unable to come. A messenger was dispatched for Dr. Wilcox, who promptly responded, but before his arrival the unborn child was dead, though the mother had not yet been relieved of it. Nothing after Dr. Wilcox arrived the trouble was apparently at an end. Mrs. Davis rallied and asked for food. Her wants were supplied under the direction of the three physicians and she appeared to be progressing nicely. She asked to be allowed to see her babe, but was not informed of the true nature of affairs for fear that it would injure her chances for recovery. She soon after sank into a peaceful slumber. It proved to be her last earthly sleep, for she died while still unconscious from what the doctors term "the shocks."

As before intimated, there were whisperings of suspicious and crooked work having been done by the attendants. To get at the truth of the matter a News reporter called upon Dr. Wilcox today, and that gentleman stated that there was absolutely no evidence of any malpractice or wrong doing of any kind whatever. It was one of those cases which fortunately very few physicians encounter, though their professional practice might cover a period of many years.

Doctors Dogge and Hasbrouck are both highly indignant, as are also their brother physicians, at the rumors of malpractice being put in circulation. They know nothing about rumored arrests or suit for damages, as has been hinted at.

Funeral services were held over Mrs. Davis' remains at Skewes' undertaking parlors this afternoon.

The body was buried in Mount Olivet cemetery.

MORGAN STAKE CONFERENCE.

The quarterly conference of the Morgan Stake convened Sunday and Monday, the 20th and 21st inst. The meetings were well attended, and a good spirit and feeling were manifest. Among those who spoke during the conference, besides the Stake Presidency, were Elders Clark and Welch, who had just returned from foreign missions; Elders Goddard and Ellis, who are traveling in the interest of the Sabbath schools; Elder John Seaman of Weber and Elder B. H. Roberts. Elder Roberts delivered three very instructive discourses, two at the conference and one at the Priesthood meeting. His subjects were the purpose and importance of our conferences, the order of the Priesthood and duties of its members; the speaker also quoted from the saying of the Prophet Daniel regarding the Kingdom of God being set up in the last days to succeed all other kingdoms. Much good advice was given by the other brethren who addressed the conference on the proper training and educating the young in the principles of the Gospel, and advised the brethren not to lay their religion aside for politics or anything else, but to be governed by the Spirit of the Lord in all matters.

At the close of the conference the home missionaries who had been traveling for the past six months were honorably released and another good corps appointed. A. FRANCIS, Stake Clerk.

MORGAN, Nov. 24, 1892.

HAMMER-HEAD SNAKE.

A letter from Dr. E. E. Brown says he and party have made a most wonderful discovery in King's River canyon, says the Belma, Cal., Irrigator. In crossing a small creek they came to a beautiful canyon or basin of about three acres of level meadow, surrounded by perpendicular walls some 300 feet high. A fine stream of cold, clear water was flowing into the little meadow, but there seemed to be no outlet. There was no way of getting down into the valley, but quail and rabbit seemed to inhabit the little basin.

A pair of opera glasses brought to light a number of snakes basking in the sun on a flat rock. They were one to three feet in length, and had heads shaped exactly like a blacksmith's hammer. While the party were examining with the glasses the maneuvers of a number of the snakes crawling through the grass, a very large one was noticed making a sneak on a cotton-tail rabbit. When within about two feet of the rabbit the snake stiffened the front half of its body, and beat it into a right angle. Then his snakelike straightened out suddenly, bringing the rabbit a swinging blow on the side of its head which laid bunny out completely.

Another snake was observed to creep on to a quail sitting on a scrubby tree. This snake twisted about four inches of its tail along a limb of the tree and used all the rest of its body for a hammer and handle to whack the quail on the head such a stinging blow that it died without a flutter of its wings. The snake seemed to have the wonderful power of lengthening its body out nearly double its normal length and as small as a whalebone and the heavier part being next to the part wrapped around the tree.

After killing the quail and rabbit the snake hammered the body into a pulp, bones and all, with its head, and then swallowed the whole business. The swallowing showed that the hammer part of the head could be laid back out of the way while the swallowing was done.

Every effort possible with the appliances they had with them was made to get one of the snakes, but they failed.

The Sevier Mining company have levied an assessment of four cents per share upon the capital stock. The proceeds will be used to more fully open the mine, improve the mill and get ready for active work next summer. This property contains large bodies of free milling gold ore, running from $20 up into the hundreds.—Journal.

$5,000,000 ON HIS WORD.

A good many things were done at the time of the Civil War in this country which were of great value to the Federal Government, but which history has never recognized.

Perhaps it will always remain a mystery who it was that placed at the disposal of the Government a great fortune in gold without asking any security, so that thereby the cruisers which were being built in England for the Confederate Government were never permitted to sail out of English harbors, says the Boston Globe.

In the early years of the war certain shipbuilders in Great Britain received commissions from the Confederate Government to build some very swift steamships, which were to be armed with long range guns, and which, sailing under letters of marque, were expected to inflict great damage upon the vessels sailing under the Union flag.

Charles Francis Adams was Minister from the United States to the British Court, and he was very anxious about these ships, because he knew that if they were ever permitted to sail from English ports the damage they could do to vessels sailing under the American flag would be enormous.

He protested to the British Government, but was told that that Government had no information that these ships were designed to prey upon the commerce of the United States. Unless Mr. Adams could furnish that information, the British Government could take no steps to restrain them.

The vessels were being built, and they were almost ready to put to sea, when Mr. Adams appeared before the British authorities with proof, which he had obtained in a manner which he alone knew, and which he kept as a secret to the day of his death, that these vessels were paid for with Confederate money, and he also furnished a complete list of officers and crews who were to sail upon them. He furnished other evidence which was convincing.

At that time it was said that the Ministry was not friendly to the Union cause, and would be glad to see the Confederate Government maintain itself.

The law of nations is very strict, however, so that England could be accused of doing an unfriendly act if she permitted these vessels to depart after such evidence.

Mr. Adams believed that the Ministry would find some technical way to evade responsibility, and he had reason for such belief.

A day or two after he had made his protest with proof he received word from the British authorities that if he would deposit $5,000,000 in gold immediately to protect the English Government against suit for damages the vessels would not be allowed to depart.

Mr. Adams was in despair. He believed this to be a trick. Of course he had not $5,000,000 at his instant command, and as there was no ocean cable in those days he could not get it from his Government in much less than three weeks' time.

Before he could hear from Washington these cruisers would be out upon the high seas.

As he sat in his office grieving greatly over this peril, a gentleman walked in who asked that absolute privacy be secured for a few moments.

When these two men were alone, secure from any possible eavesdropping, this visitor said to Mr. Adams:

"I have just learned of the demand made upon you for $5,000,000 in gold as a guarantee to the British Government to protect them in case they prevent the sailing of these cruisers. I know that you cannot command any such sum of money as that until you hear from Washington."

"I believe that this has been done to enable the vessels to sail away. Therefore I have come to offer you, Mr. Adams, that $5,000,000 in gold, and I have only one condition to impose, and that is that my name be never known in this transaction."

Mr. Adams was amazed. It seemed to him as though this was a direct interposition of Providence. After thanking most earnestly his benefactor, Mr. Adams said to him:

"I have no security to offer to you except my pledge that I will send to Washington immediately and ask that the Government forward to you its bonds as security for this loan, but for three weeks at least you will be without other security than my promise."

With this agreement the benefactor departed, and before daylight Mr. Adams had deposited the $5,000,000 in gold, to the intense surprise of the British officials.

They were obliged to keep their word, and the cruisers were restrained, and thus this great peril was removed.

As soon as it was possible to hear from Washington Mr. Adams received some $10,000,000 in Government bonds, which were turned over to the benefactor as security. Of course he received this gold back afterward and the bonds were returned.

Only one living man knows who this benefactor was. President Lincoln knew. Secretary Chase and Mr. Adams also, and they died without revealing the secret.

Mr. Chittenden, who was Register of the Treasury, and who took the bonds to England, now knows, and he has enclosed the name in an envelope, deposited it with the Secretary of the Treasury, and after his death it may be given to the world.

Yet financiers are satisfied that this benefactor of the United States who risked $5,000,000 to save it from peril was either George Peabody, the banker and philanthropist, who had long lived in London, or else one of the Baring Brothers.

These were the only men capable of commanding on the instant so great an amount of money as that in gold, who were also so friendly to the United States as to induce them to make this amazing offer.

Mr. Adams used to say, had it not been for this timely aid, perhaps the history of the Civil War would have been differently written.

In view of the fact that diphtheria exists in several places in the country, that people are continually coming from the infected districts into Richfield to conference and for other purposes, Mayor Beegmiller was last week seriously considering issuing a proclamation pointing out the dangers and the necessary precautions to be taken against the dread disease.

REMARKS

Made by Apostle Heber J. Grant, at the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, on Sunday, Nov. 6, 1892.

[REPORTED BY ARTHUR WINTER.]

It is always a source of satisfaction and pleasure to me to meet with the Latter-day Saints. I did not expect to be called upon to speak to you today, as I had the opportunity of doing so last Sunday; but in standing before you I desire, as I always do while addressing the Saints, that I may have the benefit of your faith and prayers, that the good Spirit may be present with us, and that we may be mutually benefited and strengthened in our most holy faith through having met together today. Some of the people, I know, think it is almost a set phrase with the speakers to call for the faith and prayers of the Saints, but I wish to say that I think there is altogether too much of a neglect on the part of the people in supplicating the Lord to bless and inspire those who may speak. On occasions of this kind we are guilty, as a rule, of not concentrating our thoughts and our feelings upon the speaker and desiring earnestly and prayerfully that he may be blessed of the Lord. I plead guilty myself to occasionally forgetting, while my brethren are speaking, to pray to the Lord to bless them by His Holy Spirit. I know from experience that no Elder stands up to address the Saints, if he has a sincere desire to benefit them, without earnestly desiring the faith and prayers of the people. I know that if I were to consult my own feelings, I would prefer to keep my seat instead of addressing the people. Those of you who have been called upon to speak to the Saints can fully appreciate this feeling, because you have no doubt experienced it. There is a dread and a timidity that follow all of us when we stand up before the people to proclaim unto them the plan of life and salvation. I suppose it is well that such is the case, because we realize our own dependence, our own weakness, and our own inability to instruct those that we speak to without the aid of the Holy Spirit. This fear that follows me on all occasions while addressing the Saints is something that I do not experience in the ordinary affairs of life. To stand up before the people and speak to them upon business matters, or, as I have done in years gone by, make political speeches in the interests of the People's Party, has not worried me at all. That timidity and dread which accompanies me in speaking to the people about their duties and upon the Gospel did not come to me on these other occasions. I understood the subject that I expected to handle, I knew exactly the points that I desired to make, and I got up and pitched into my work, as it were, without hesitation. I am thankful myself that this spirit of timidity has always attended me in public speaking to the Latter-day Saints, because I never want to be in a position where I do not feel a desire that the light and the inspiration of God may abide with me in speaking to the people. I know I cannot comprehend that which is for the best good of the people, but through the voice of inspiration. In response to the prayers of the assembled Saints, I do know that God will bless me and others that stand before you from time to time to proclaim unto you the duties and the obligations that you owe to your Maker.

I wish to say that in preaching to the Latter-day Saints concerning the duties devolving upon them as members of the Church of Christ, all that I say to them I proclaim to myself. While proclaiming to the Latter-day Saints the obligations resting upon them, I have been admonished to more strongly desire the onward advancement of God's kingdom than I have sometimes in listening to my brethren and sisters speak. Why? Because of the spirit that has been given to me, and because of feeling my own dependence upon God, and being blessed of Him in teaching the Saints. The blessings of the Spirit that have come to me have strengthened my determination to press forward to the best of my ability in discharging the duties that rest upon me as one of the members of the Church of Christ. We are all differently possessed of talents and ability. God has given to some great talent in writing in defense of the people. He has given others talent in standing up and proclaiming the Gospel. He has given to others talents in attending to the daily duties devolving upon us as members of the Church. If all of us, to the full extent of the talents that God has given us, shall discharge every obligation resting upon us in this life, then when we shall have finished our work here we will have a joyful entering into the presence of God. The welcome that we shall receive will be a cordial one, and we will be satisfied and contented with the labors that we have performed. But if, on the other hand, we have been endowed by our heavenly Father with gifts and graces, and we have been negligent and indifferent and have not labored with all the ability that we possessed, there will be a constant source of regret. We never neglect our duties without there comes to us a punishment of conscience. There is a joy, a happiness, a peace and a satisfaction that come to the human heart through the fulfillment of the duties devolving upon us that bring a great deal of comfort. If a man has the assurance within his own heart that he is worthy, and that he is laboring to the best of his ability to do good, he can stand up under the condemnation, the criticism and the censure of those by whom he is surrounded. But if a man does not know within himself that his conscience is void of offense, if he has not a testimony of the Gospel within him, if he is not anxious to labor for the spread of righteousness, he is not happy, he is not satisfied, although perchance he may have the praise, the commendation and the support of all his associates and of the community in which he lives. Far better, my friends, that we shall be able to so order our lives that we will have consciences void of offense; that we can supplicate our Heavenly Father to guide and direct us in all the walks of life, and can feel that we are blessed of the Lord, than that it is for us to have the praise and approval of the community in which we live. The reward of a man's conscience is far better than the praise of those who cannot read his heart. I know that some of the labors that I have endeavored to accomplish have brought upon me the criticism of the Latter-day Saints; yet, knowing that these labors were in the interest of the Church of God, I was willing, rather than to step aside and not try to accomplish that which I felt assured was for the good of the community, to stand up under the criticism many times of some of my dearest friends.

We have come upon the earth for the purpose of gaining an experience. We have been placed upon this earth because of our faithfulness in having kept our first estate. The labors that we performed in the sphere that we left before we came here have had a certain effect upon our lives here, and to a certain extent they govern and control the lives that we lead here, just the same as the labors that we do here will control and govern our lives when we pass from this stage of existence. It has been revealed to us, through the Prophet Joseph Smith, that whatever degree of intelligence we shall attain to in this life, the same will rise with us in the life to come. It is because of this knowledge that we will have an advantage over those that are negligent, in the life to come. It is now explained to my mind how some come into this world without any particular degree of energy or desire to labor for their fellows and for the spread of righteousness; it is because of their failure to have kept their first estate with diligence and with fidelity. It will be explained in like manner in the life to come that those who are faithful will have this promise that I have referred to fulfilled upon their heads and that the degree of intelligence which we attain here will give us the advantage there. I would urge upon every one to labor with zeal and with all the power that we possess, so that we may have the approval of our labors by our Heavenly Father, and that we shall be prepared and qualified to enter into his presence, and to there have wisdom and intelligence to press forward in the labors that will develope upon us in the life to come.

In the meeting that we had last Sunday, among other things I referred to the building of the Salt Lake Temple, and urged upon the Latter-day Saints to make an effort to the full extent of their ability in contributing of the substance with which they had been blessed to aid in the completion of that Temple. I now make the same appeal with reference to all the duties that rest upon us as Latter-day Saints. If we shall, to the full extent of our ability, labor for the onward advancement of God's kingdom, then there will be no other requirement made of us. One of the requirements made of the Latter-day Saints is that they shall be faithful in attending to their prayers, both their secret and family prayers. The object that our Heavenly Father has in requiring this is that we may be in communication with Him, and that we may have a channel between us and the heavens whereby we can bring down upon ourselves blessings from above. No individual that is humble and prayerful before God, and supplicates Him every day for the light and inspiration of His Holy Spirit, will ever become lifted up in the pride of his heart, or feel that the intelligence and the wisdom that he possesses are all-sufficient for him. The prayerful and humble man will always realize and feel that he is dependent upon God for every blessing that he enjoys, and in praying to God he will not only pray for the light and the inspiration of His Holy Spirit to guide him, but he will feel to thank God for the blessings he receives, realizing that life, that health, that strength, and that all the intelligence which he possesses comes from God, who is the Author of his existence. If we do not keep this channel of communication open between us and our Heavenly Father, then we are robbed of the light and the inspiration of His Spirit, and of that feeling of gratitude and thanksgiving that fills our heart and that desires to praise God for His goodness and mercy to us. There is no feeling that is more Godlike than that feeling of intense gratitude and thanksgiving to God that comes when we realize and feel that God has blessed us. It has been the testimony of all that have been abroad preaching the Gospel, and who have been able to bring conviction to the hearts of their fellows as to the divinity of the mission in which they are engaged, that the joy and gratitude which fill their hearts in thus being the instruments in the hands of God of bringing people to a knowledge of the plan of life and salvation was greater than they had power to express. We should cultivate that spirit and that disposition to so order our lives that we will ever have a feeling of gratitude and of thanksgiving in our hearts, and a desire to praise God for His goodness to us. We will not be able to have this feeling if we are negligent and thoughtless in attending to the duty of praying to our heavenly Father. So also with all the requirements that are made of us as Latter-day Saints. They are all for our benefit; for our advancement, and to fit and prepare us to go back into the presence of God. We have come upon this earth for the purpose of carrying out the mind and will of our Heavenly Father, and working out for ourselves an exaltation in the celestial kingdom of our Father; and just as surely as we understand, by the natural intelligence that we possess, that if we enter into a college or university and desire to attain a certain degree we must labor to that end, just so surely it will be necessary for us to labor and to fulfill the duties and the obligations resting upon us and to keep this law upon which a seat in the celestial kingdom is predicated. The sooner we awaken to a full realization of the fact that it is the amount of good that we do that will bring to us the blessings of God, the better it will be for us. No amount of knowledge, of inspiration and testimony as to the divinity of the work of God will be of benefit to us unless we put that knowledge into actual practice in the daily walks of life. It is not the amount that any individual may know that will benefit him and his fellows; but it is the practical application of that knowledge. There are many men that are great students, and yet so far as making a practical application of their knowledge they are almost what might be called educated fools. There are some Latter-day Saints (it may be a harsh expression, but it is true) that are almost educated fools, so far as the knowledge of the Gospel and the keeping of the commandments are concerned. I know men that testify that they have received a knowledge of the divinity of the work in which they are engaged, by the voice of inspiration to them and by seeing the sick healed by the power of God, and yet these very individuals are negligent in keeping the commandments of God. There are many that testify that they know that this is the work of God, and all they do is to bear that testimony. There are some people that attend meetings year after year and listen to the servants of the Lord teach them in simplicity and humility the duties that devolve upon them, and they go away from those meetings and never put in practice what they hear; yet they take great credit to themselves for always going to meeting. Now, my friends, if you always went to your dinner, sat down and took a good look at the food, and never partook of any of it, it would not be long till you died of starvation. There are some Latter-day Saints that go to meeting, and they die of starvation spiritually because they do not receive and digest the spiritual food that is dispensed there. We should not be hearers of the word alone, but doers of it, too. There is nothing that will bring more of the Spirit of God than to carry out the advice and the counsel given to us here last Sunday—that we should be kind, considerate, charitable, long-suffering and forgiving. There is nothing that will bring more joy to us than to be ready and willing to forgive the trespasses of our neighbors against us, and there is nothing that will bring more condemnation to us than to harden our hearts and to be bitter and vindictive in our feelings towards those by whom we are surrounded. I find here in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, on page 240, the following:

My disciples, in days of old, sought occasion against one another, and forgave not one another in their hearts; and for this evil they were afflicted, and sorely chastened: Wherefore I say unto you, that ye ought to forgive one another, for he that forgiveth not his brother his trespasses standeth condemned before the Lord, for there remaineth in him the greater sin. I, the Lord, will forgive whom I will forgive, but of you it is required to forgive all men; and ye ought to say, when ye hear of God judging between me and thee, and reward thee according to thy deeds. And he that repenteth not of his sins, and confesseth them not, then ye shall bring him before the church, and do with him as the Scripture saith unto you, either by commandment or by revelation. And that ye shall do that God may be glorified, not because ye forgive not, having not compassion, but that ye may be justified in the eyes of the law, that ye may not offend him who is your Lawgiver. Verily I say, for this cause ye shall do those things.

I think I referred to this passage, without reading it, last Sunday. But I wish to say that I have met some who were here last Sunday who imagined that I had taken occasion against my fellow servant who preaches to you, and that I had undertaken to sit down, so to speak, on what he said. I am very glad to be able to stand up here before the Latter-day Saints and say that I never thought of such a thing. I had no need to seek occasion against my brother who preceded me in speaking, as not one single word did he say in my hearing but I could say amen to with all my heart. Instead of my undertaking to correct his remarks, I stated to that audience that I had rejoiced in what had been said; and so I had. I had a brother come to me and tell me that the advice was given here last Sunday that a man should seek for certain counsel regarding political matters from his Bishop and the President of the Stake, and if he did not get what he wanted, to go to the Presidency of the Church. A good Elder came to me and said that Latter-day Saints that were here last Sabbath went away and told this. All I have got to say is that the Latter-day Saints that went away and told these things, not only were seeking occasion against their brethren, but they were telling that which was false. It does seem to me that Latter-day Saints should not be running around seeing what they can hear to find fault with. Why, my remarks last Sabbath, instead of undertaking to disagree with my brethren, were partly upon this very subject. I referred to the fact that in the recent conference two of my associates preached sermons on home manufacture, and, being Republicans politically, some of my Democratic friends had found fault with what they said, and intimated that they were preaching politics. I told the Latter-day Saints then that I endorsed every word that was said, and if the fact of a man being a Republican would make him any better advocate of home manufacture, I was very glad to have him be a Republican, because I believed in home manufacture, I wore Provo goods, and had done so for ten years, and I called upon the Latter-day Saints to do the same. I do not ask you to wear Provo goods alone, but wear the goods of the Deseret Woolen Mills, or Beaver, or Franklin, or any other home factory. I am so put together that I believe if we can take a piece of wool and change it into manufactured goods we are benefiting the community in which we live; that if we can take a beet and change it into sugar, we are also benefiting the community. And I do not consider when I talk home manufacture I am talking Democracy; neither do I consider when one of the servants of God, who is a Republican politically, talks home manufacture that he is talking Republicanism. We as Latter-day Saints should not allow our political convictions to be so rank in our hearts that they cause us to seek occasion against our brother when that brother is preaching to us the plan of life and salvation and laboring for the advancement of God's kingdom, or when he is preaching to us upon the subject of our temporal welfare and salvation. It is the duty of every man who occupies the position that I occupy here today to call upon those assembled to give him the benefit of their faith and prayers, that he may be inspired of God to say those things that are for the benefit of the people. We are engaged in the work of God, and our temporal salvation is of equal importance almost with our spiritual salvation; and if the servants of God are inspired from time to time, in answer to the prayers of those who are assembled to hear, to speak with reference to our temporal salvation, do not, for heaven's sake, go away from the meeting and undertake to seek occasion against your brethren for addressing you as they are led by the Spirit of God, in answer to your own prayers. If I could sing, I would like to sing you a fine song; but I once had my character read by a physiognomist, and among other things he told me that I could sing, but he said, I should like to be at least forty miles away while you are doing it. If I were a good singer I would like to sing you this song, but not being able to do so, I will repeat it, if I have not forgotten it; and if you remember it, it will do you almost as much good as if it were sung:

Let each man learn to know himself.

To gain that knowledge let him labor.
Improve those failings in him—if
Which he condemns so in his neighbor.

How leniently our own faults we view,
And conscience voice adaptsly smother;
Yet, oh how harshly we review
The self-same failings in another!

O list to that small voice within,
Whose whisperings oft make men confounded;
And trumpet not another's sin—
You'd bask deep if your own were sounded.

And if you meet an erring one,
Whose deeds are blameable and thoughtless
Consider, are you cast the stone?
If you yourself be pure and spotless.

And in self-judgment if you find
Your deeds to others are superior,
To you has Providence been kind,
As you should be to those inferior.

Example sheds a genial ray of light,
Which men are apt to borrow;
So first improve yourself today,
And then improve your fellows tomorrow.

God bless you. Amen.

SAMOA MISSION.

On the morning of October 15th, a party composed of President George E. Browning, Elders C. W. Poole, George McCune and H. L. Bassett, left Fagaili, Upolu, in an open boat, the Faaliga, bound for Savali, via Lalovi, Upolu. We made a stop in Apia to attend to some business, and then started on our journey to Lalovi, at the western extremity of the Island of Upolu, about thirty miles distant from Apia. We made but slow progress owing to a strong west wind that blew in our "head." When we had reached a point lying about seven or eight miles west of Fagaili we ran up to the shore and waited while Elder McCune walked on a short distance to Paipaa, where one of our Saints, Iopo, lives, and informed him of the whereabouts of our boat. It had been previously arranged that Iopo should accompany us on our journey. They soon reached us and we again set out down the coast.

After a long and hard row we reached Lalovi at two o'clock in the morning of the next day (Sunday). After a few hours' rest we arose and assumed our Sabbath day duties. We held two well attended meetings, one in the forenoon and one in the afternoon, with Elders Poole and Bassett as speakers at the former, and President Geo. E. Browning and Brother Iopo at the latter.

Next day (Monday) the natives busied themselves in making preparations for the journey on the morrow, to Savali, to which place we were to go to hold conference. According to expectation, we started out on our trip by boat to Savali on Tuesday, Oct. 18. There was a crew of ten oarsmen. In addition there were President Geo. E. Browning, C. W. Poole, Geo. McCune, H. L. Bassett, Iopo, Papouli, Taatua and Salefu. We had a breeze and sailed almost all the way across the channel to Savali, only using the oars for the last mile or two. When we reached the nearest point of Savali, Elders Poole and McCune got out of the boat, as they desired to walk to Salelologa and there meet Elder A. Twitcheil, when all three could proceed on foot to Saleaula, arriving there in time for conference. President George E.

Browning and Elder Bassett remained in the boat, which, after waiting an hour or two at a neighboring village, resumed its journey towards Saleaula, some thirty-five miles further down the coast. We went outside of the reef again at a place called Faga. The passage through the reef was a very dangerous one, and it was only with great difficulty that we got through. We found the sea outside in terrible commotion, and our boat pitched and tossed about awfully. Though the sail was up and the wind was strong enough to propel us, the oars were plying continuously to steady the boat. After a long and perilous ride in the darkness we found ourselves opposite our destination, with a dangerous reef between us and safety. None of us knew where to find a passage through the reef, and the question was discussed, but soon whether or not to remain out at sea till daylight. The night was dark. Beneath us rolled waves of inky blackness; the heavens were obscured by dark, lowering clouds.

It was finally decided to seek an inlet through the reef. Again and again we crept up cautiously towards the reef, only to hasten back again to a safer distance. We finally reached a place where the roaring of the waters upon the reef were not so loud, and with each oarsman pulling with his might the boat shot towards the island. With each occupant of the boat offering up a prayer for safety, we waited almost breathlessly for the result. The waters surged and roared on either side of us, and dark though the night was we could see the white foam of each incoming wave as it was beaten into flying spray upon the reef. Our suspense was not of long duration. An allwise Providence had smiled graciously upon us, and it seemed as though a master hand had guided us through the dreaded barrier into safety. We were soon into quiet waters and paddling our way up the coast. A few minutes later and we were received with welcome at Vaitutu by Elders Carpenter and Merrill and the Saints. It was about 10:30 p. m. when we reached there.

VAITUTU, Savali, Samoa, Thursday, Oct. 20.

Elders C. W. Poole, A. Twitcheil and Geo. McCune got here at about one o'clock p. m., having walked from the east end of the island. The next day (Oct. 21st) Elders C. H. Bridges and C. R. Thomanon arrived at about 7 p. m., having come from Gagatuli on the opposite side of Savali. The Fagatuli Saints were unable to be present on the morning of Oct. 22nd. About 9:30 a baptism was performed. The applicant was a young lady named Oeone. She was baptized by Elder Jos. H. Carpenter. In the afternoon of the same day the Saints brought to us presents of food, consisting of pige, chickens, fish, taro, bananas, etc, and a pleasant feast was indulged in. The meal being over, the young folks put on their finest ornaments and adornings, and gave in our honor what is termed a "Taloa." They marched along before us to the accompaniment of a drum. The procession was headed by a young man who danced along, dexterously twirling a huge war knife. The parade halted in front of us and each person stepped forward and laid down a present consisting of one taro or one chicken. When this was over "alva" or native dance was given, the young men performing first and the young ladies following. Our boat crew from Upolu then performed their "alva." The whole was a pleasing sight, and was performed very gracefully, and was rendered in good time. The programme concluded with a shooting contest by the school children, with bows and arrows.

In the evening a very pleasant time was had listening to the young folks sing their "vil," or songs of praise. The missionaries aided their quota to the musical exercises.

On the morning of Sunday, Oct. 23d, the first meeting of our conference was held in the Saleaula meeting house, commencing at eight o'clock. Jos. H. Carpenter, Pres. of the Savili branch, was in charge. The missionaries present were Pres. Geo. E. Browning, J. H. Carpenter, H. L. Bassett, C. H. Bridges, A. Twitchell, Jos. W. Merrill, Geo. McCune, C. R. Thomason and C. W. Poole.

After singing and prayer President George E. Browning addressed the meeting, illustrating the importance of accompanying our faith with works. President Carpenter followed.

A Sunday school meeting was held commencing at 10 o'clock a.m. President Carpenter presiding. He offered a few words of welcome to the parents of the children and to all who had assembled to witness the exercises. Pupils of President Carpenter's class came to the stand and quoted several passages of scripture bearing on the Gospel, and made explanatory remarks on the same. Elder Merrill's class then went to the stand and answered. After this the whole school recited in concert the Articles of Faith. The roll was then called, and after singing, the benediction was pronounced by Brother Faaleua.

In the afternoon another meeting was held. Elder C. H. Bridges addressed the congregation, exhorting the Saints to be faithful. Elder George McCune was the next speaker.

A testimony meeting was held in the evening. President Carpenter presided and counseled the Saints to embrace the opportunity of bearing their testimony. A number responded. At the close a missionary meeting was held. President Carpenter presiding. The Elders spoke in the following order: H. L. Bassett, Geo. McCune, Jos. H. Merrill, C. H. Bridges, C. W. Poole, J. H. Carpenter, C. R. Thomason, A. Twitchell and President Geo. E. Browning.

At 6 o'clock a.m. on the morrow (Oct. 24) meeting was again held, with a congregation of fifty-seven. President Carpenter presiding. The Church authorities, general and local, were then presented to the conference and sustained by unanimous vote. The semi-annual report of the mission was read and approved. Elder Bassett spoke on characteristics of the Church, also on the subject of "Organization." Elder C. R. Thomason bore his testimony to the truth of the Gospel, and dwelt on faith and works. Elder A. Twitchell also addressed the meeting.

At the afternoon gathering President Carpenter presided and Elder C. W. Poole addressed the congregation. President George E. Browning added a few words.

Conference adjourned for six months. In the evening we assembled in the meeting house and listened to an interesting programme by the Saleaula school. The exercises consisted of the recitation of English words and their meaning in the Samoan language. A few songs were also sung.

On Tuesday morning, October 25th, the Upolu party, consisting of President George E. Browning, George McCune, H. L. Bassett and the Upolu Saints, left Vaitutu on their return trip to Upolu. The sea was calm and we had a pleasant trip up the coast to the village of Asaga. We remained there for about two hours, when we again set out and reached Safotulafai just before sundown. We stopped here but a few minutes then set out for Upolu. A slight breeze was blowing, so we sailed part of the way. We reached Lalovi, Upolu, at about midnight. At about two o'clock p. m. of the next day, Pres. Browning, H. L. Bassett and two native Saints, Ilopa and Tagalona, left Lalovi in the Church boat Faaliga bound for Fagali. We intended to go right through without a stop, but on account of headwinds made but slow progress. We rowed till two o'clock in the morning, when a strong headwind struck us and we ran in at Puipua till daylight. At seven o'clock we again started out and reached Fagali about 9:30 finding all well at the mission house.

SISTER ALMIRA GREEN.

I have been requested to forward for publication in the News a few items which are thought of interest to your readers relative to the career of the late Sister Almira Green whose eventful life has been more or less identified with the movements of the Church from her infancy until the time of her recent demise, which cast a deep gloom over the whole settlement in which she resided.

Sister Almira Green was the daughter of Peter I. Meslek and Maria Spencer. She was born at Leyden, Lewis county, New York, on the 8th day of November, 1838. Her father joined the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints while unmarried.

After marriage the father desired to gather with and follow the movements of the body of the church. Almira, who was only four years of age, went with him and followed the meanderings of the Church for the rest of her natural life.

In course of time the father and daughter reached Nauvoo and at the time of the martyrdom lived with the family of Patria C. Hyrum Smith, and shared with the Saints their expulsion from that beloved city.

They participated with them in their sufferings in the cold winter in the wilderness.

When the Immortal Five Hundred were called for by the government, Almira's father was enrolled in the Mormon Battalion and marched through the deserts to defend his country's flag against the aggressions of Mexico. He left little Almira in the charge of the family of Brother Stephen Winchester, who most nobly discharged their trust, and watched over the child with paternal solicitude.

Having served his time in the battalion the father arrived in Salt Lake valley with Captain James Brown's detachment. Shortly after his arrival here he returned to the east with President Brigham Young and company, where he met the Winchester family and his dear little daughter in good health and all rejoiced to meet each other once again.

They then proceeded to Hannaker ferry, Atchison county, Missouri, where on the 25th of February, 1848, her father was married to Miss Cynthia Flint, after which the family moved to Salt Lake City.

In the spring of 1851 Almira accompanied her father on a mission to San Bernardino, California. Four years later, at the age of seventeen, she was married to Elder Ammon Green. In 1858 the whole family returned to Utah and finally settled at West Weber, in Weber, where they have ever since resided.

For many months past Sister Green has been much afflicted. She was a great but patient sufferer, and on the 20th of November, 1892, she succumbed to the fell destroyer of life. The more immediate cause of her death was diphtheria. She was the mother of thirteen children and thirteen grandchildren. Twelve children and the same number of grandchildren survive her. Her father preceded her to the spirit world several years since.

On Tuesday, the 25th inst., the meeting house at West Weber was filled to its utmost capacity with friends from far and near, who came to participate in the obsequies of their beloved friend. The services were conducted by President Robert McFarland. The speakers were Elders Joseph Hall, Chas. H. Greenwell, President Chas. F. Middleton, Thomas Etherington and Robert McFarland. Each spoke with much fervor and in high terms of appreciation of the godly life of the deceased, of her intrinsic merits as a wife, mother, neighbor and althlful Latter-day Saint. She was never so happy as when she was administering to the happiness of others.

Her loved name will never perish,
Nor her memory crown the dust.

She is enshrined in the hearts of hundreds who knew her.

An immense cortege followed the remains to the Ogden cemetery where they were laid to repose until the resurrection shall again unite her with her family and the redeemed thousands who shall reign on the earth.

THE COAL SWINDLE.

A gentleman of this city, claiming to be familiar with the subject, of which he speaks, said today:

"A few years ago a coal operator of extended experience in the east, as owner and manager of coal mines, submitted to the Pleasant Valley Coal company a proposition to operate its coal mines in Winter Quarters Canyon, Emery county, for a period of years, on the following terms: He would take the mines in the condition they were in, then, would do all necessary "dead work," furnish all necessary props and "T" rails, lay all required tracks in the mines, furnish mine cars, keep the mines in first-class condition, furnish all foremen, clerks and other help, all at his own expense, and would load the coal on the cars, for one dollar and five cents per ton. In other words, the total cost to the company for mining the coal and keeping the mines in first class condition was to be the figure named. The party making the proposition only asked, in addition to this price as the total cost of producing the coal and loading it in the cars, the privilege of cutting timber for props on the company's land surrounding the mines, and the exclusive privilege of running a store and boarding house at the mines. He was willing to guarantee to furnish any amount of coal that might be required, and to give a suitable bond for the faithful performance of his contract.

At that time the miners were being paid 70 cents per ton for mining the coal, and, he says, there was no complaint among them against that price, which was what the party making the above proposition expected to continue to pay. Good miners easily made from $3.50 to $4.50 per day. The amount paid the miners, 70 cents, deducted from the price the company were to pay for the coal on the cars, $1.05, left 35 cents on each ton mined, out of which was to come the cost of "dead work," timber, track, foremanship, clerk hire, and the operator's profits. The latter, according to the expectations of the party making the proposition, based on forty years' experience in the business, would have been fair.

The proposition was rejected, presumably for the reason that the company could keep its mines in good condition and put its coal on the cars for less than $1.05 per ton. Since that time conditions have changed but little at these mines. The cost of taking the coal from the earth has not necessarily been increased, and it is to be further presumed, he says, that modern appliances and methods have made it less, and that the miners are now being paid sixty-five instead of seventy cents per ton.

The Pleasant Valley coal mines are situated about 125 miles from Salt Lake City; yet citizens have to pay $5.25 delivered, or $4.75 at the yard, for a ton of coal which costs, laid on the cars at the mines, including every item entering into the expense of its production, not more than from one dollar to one dollar and five cents.

It is stated that about one half of the coal consumed in this city comes from the Pleasant Valley mines, and that the dealers of this city sell, in the aggregate, about a ton per minute. The mines named may, therefore, be credited selling about thirty tons per hour, or say 250 tons per day, in this city alone, which certainly is not an overestimate.

There is comparatively little complaint at paying 50 cents for the delivery of a ton of coal. Purchasers, therefore, take the price at which it is sold at the yard, viz.: $4.75; deducting the cost of mining, which is put at $1.05, leaves $3.70. At the time the above proposition was made the NEWS informant states that the railroad company charged the enormous rate of $2 per ton freight to this city, and allowing the road the same rate now, there still remains $1.70 profit on every ton of Pleasant Valley coal sold in this city. He says also that on a staple like coal, where a cast iron "cash down" rule is enforced, as is the case in this city at the present time, 25 cents per ton profit on such an out put as the Pleasant Valley mines dispose of in this city would pay better than any ordinary line of merchandising, and one dollar per ton freight would be a high rate from the mines to this point.

From the foregoing he says it can be seen that Pleasant Valley coal might be sold in this city for freight on the cars at the mine, $1.05; plus freight, $1.00; plus profit, 25c; total, $2.30. In every case, the gentleman claims that coal ought to sell in this city to the retail customer for not to exceed $3 per ton at the yard instead of $4.75, and to the wholesale customer at a considerable discount. He concluded his interview with the NEWS representative by saying rather emphatically:

"The railroads and coal mines combined are robbing the inhabitants of this city to the extent of at least $1.75 on every ton of coal sold at retail to them. The question is: How long will a city as large, wealthy and powerful as ours submit to this state of things?"

AN OHIOAN IN UTAH.

A few words before I return home to my family in the great and distant state of Ohio. I feel as if I want to say something about the "Mormons," having lived nearly five months among them. When I was eighteen years of age, running a paper machine at Watertown, New York, I went up into the paper sorting room and found the Book of Mormon and read it. I also remember the Mormon missionaries at Little Eaton, England, forty years ago and the converts they made. I have read Reader's Book of Mormonism, have it in my library. Most of its contents I now know to be false representations. I have heard Ann Eliza Young talk, so that I have known something for and against Mormonism for a long time. My conclusions now are based on facts, not theories. "O Jerusalem, that killeth the Prophets and stoneth them that have come unto you!" The murdering of Joseph and Hyrum Smith was barbarous. They had a right to live if their doctrine was false. The oracles of Judea today although a million souls perished to drive out the followers of the false Prophet—Mahomet. Joseph Smith did not say that he was the Christ or the one who was to come to redeem Israel; nay, only that he had a revelation. In 1873, while my wife, two daughters and I were on our way to Watertown, New York, our youthful home, an old gentleman boarded the train at Palmyra and I asked him to show me the mountain the Book of Mormon plates were found in. He did, so, and I inquired if he was a "Mormon" and if he believed the plates were found there from which the Book of Mormon was written. He said he was not a "Mormon," but that he did believe Joseph Smith's statement as to the finding of the plates.

Now as to revelation. Has there not always been such? I will not weary you with a long article, but say the "Mormons" are a remarkable people, and if the providence of God is not their protection I am puzzled to know what is. Your valley blossoms as the rose, and you have everlasting streams of water. You have gathered in from all lands, and God has blessed you surely, because He maketh the sun to shine on the hill top and in the valley, and He clothes the smiling fields with corn. When the "Mormons" came here through Emigration Canyon they came to escape persecution and to be able to worship God according to their own ideas. Did not the Pilgrim Fathers do the same? But they bled at the stake their supposed witches. John Calvin of revered memory had his servant burned to death. I see no such spirit in the "Mormon" Church. They have a good and correct way of maintaining the church of the living God. "They that honor Me I will honor," saith the Lord, "and bring your tithes and offerings into the House of the Lord and see if I will not pour out a blessing upon you." The unfortunate are taken care of among the "Mormons," and "Mormonism" is one of the three great "isms" of the world. I see no more wrong doing here than in Puritan Massachusetts, where the boys and girls are not allowed to sit together in meetings.

Now another question: Why should the government of the United States take the Church property from the "Mormons?" I cannot comprehend. The different sects have their valuable property and enjoy it unmolested. Well, all I say is it is unjust.

Now a word about your beautiful Temple. David could not build the first because he shed too much blood. On Gilead's top fell noble Saul, who spared the women and children and choice oxen—"O, the son of Kish!" Now you have a beautiful Temple and the angel with his trumpet in hand standing on its high pinnacle—calling forth the Saints in a beautiful emblem. (Chronicles 13th chapter.) And when you dedicate your Temple to Jehovah, no doubt from the chapter named, 82nd and 83rd verses, you will proclaim: "Moreover, concerning the stranger which is not of thy people Israel but is come from a far country for thy great name's sake and thy mighty hand and thy stretched out arms if they come to pray in this house, then hear thou from the heavens, even from thy dwelling place, and do according to all the stranger calleth to thee for, that all people of the earth may know thy name and fear thee as doth thy people Israel, and may know that this house which I have built is called by thy name."

In conclusion, I wish to say I attended the service of the Granite ward last Sunday, and was greatly pleased with the preaching of the truth as I there heard it. It was the first "Mormon" sermon I had ever heard. I wish some of my Methodist, Presbyterian and Baptist friends could have heard it. The line of thought was to elevate man and lead him to love God and his neighbor. JOHN W. BARBER.

THE COAL COMBINE RAMPANT.

Combines and trusts are about the hardest commercial factors with which the public have to do, and illustrate at times with wonderful force and precision how men may not violate any law of man and still be lawless—worse, sometimes, than those who do violate statutory enactments. In a quiet, unpretentious sort of way, which leaves no palpable ground for suspicion and no possible opportunity for a legal action, a few men sometimes get together and by uniting their capital and facilities upon some corner of the market which has distinctive features in the matter of supply and demand and which everybody must have, they just as noiselessly (on their part) control the trade, undo all recognized rules of traffic and ignore every protest, threat, demand or claim that comes their way.

There never was a fairer or richer field for the sinister performances of this genus than Salt Lake City, this having particular reference to the coal business. From 500 to 1000 tons a day are consumed by families and business houses alone, every ounce of which is purchased from one of a half a dozen firms acting jointly with the railroads. There are no other means of getting it, and no one can do without it, especially at this time of the year. What a steady, unvarying market to operate in! How sure the supply, how certain its disposition and how secure the pay! With such a field of operations people at a distance would look for square dealing and reasonable profits, on which terms a good living could be made by those engaged in the business; but those at a distance don't know. It is computed that at $4 a ton the net profit to the dealer here would be twenty-five per cent, providing he is reasonably equipped for the traffic, which all of those spoken of are. It does not require an insight into the situation to make commercial men anywhere understand that any business in which there are no risks to speak of and which yields such returns is illegitimate or else there is something abnormal in the market; but what would he say if told that even that is not satisfactory to the dealers—that they charge thirty per cent more, and by means of short measure and worthless stuff mixed with their goods bring the amount which the consumer has to pay up about 100 per cent, or $8 per ton! And of course the increase in the price is all profit, or nearly so, because exacted mostly from shrinkage and worthless trash.

Now, when men combine to keep up this kind of thing, are they guilty of nothing at all? And when the grand jury takes the matter in hand and the municipal government enacts a law requiring at least honest measurements in the traffic, if the dealers announce that they will have to advance prices if the ordinance is enforced, does it not look very much like a confession of guilt? Suppose a grocer were called upon by the scaler of weights and measures and notified that his scales were untrue, by means of which those who bought a pound of anything only got fourteen ounces; or that his gallon measure had shrunk so much that it would hold only seven pints, and were thereupon to notify the merchant that he must at once conform to the standard, what would he most likely do? If an honest dealer he would show that he was in previous ignorance of the shortage, express regret that there had been any such transactions in his place of business and proceed at once to not only rectify the wrong but, so far as practicable, make restitution to those who had been losers by it; if a dishonest man he would complain of the law's arbitrary methods and announce that by complying with it he would be compelled to advance his prices to meet the difference in his receipts. Is it not so?

This is all wrong, and wrong-doing sooner or later brings loss and disaster to those who persist in it. There can be no reasonable objection to men combining in their means and uniting their force for the accomplishment of legitimate enterprises in a lawful and proper way. It is in this manner that the greater business affairs of life which in their own would not create are brought into existence and successful operation, whereby everybody is benefited. It is only when such combinations are effected for the purpose of taking advantage in an unfair as well as illegal manner that the right to complain is recognized. Let it not be supposed that a rightful complaint coming from a whole people and continued so long as the evil complained of is practiced, will be ineffectual for a great length of time; the remedy, sooner or later, will suggest itself and be applied. There is surely enough of profit in selling coal anywhere in this city at $5.50 per 2000 pounds without dust or dirt; there would be at a dollar less than that, but no matter as to that just now. So long as we get what we pay for, the question of prices can be determined later. Meantime, it would be the part of wisdom to increase the tension no further; if the coal men do as other departments of trade do, the goose may continue laying golden eggs for a season longer, but not beyond that we hope and believe.

A PECULIAR CASE.

Prince Bismarck occupies a peculiar position, one that is more so than any he has yet been in, and his life of late years has been far from exemption from annoying situations. He would have it appear that he interpolated the concluding sentence of King William's reply to the French minister at Emu in 1870, this being the direct cause of the minister's recall and the declaration of war by Louis Napoleon. Bismarck's opponents and enemies claim the other way, that the king himself wrote the entire message and was alone responsible for its contents. It thus appears that the prince is trying to convict himself of forgery and those who are against him in everything are determined that his innocence shall be established!

That the master mind of the great chancellor and patriotic German was a constant guide to the sturdy Prussian monarch is admitted on all sides; how far such guidance went no one but Bismarck himself can tell. If he made the change claimed by him he did a most shameful thing, the only defense to which is the doubtful one of the end justifying the means. He claims that the interpolation was what provoked France into declaring war, and as a result of the war Germany became a confederation with the former king of that ruler's reply as it came from his hand would not have been such provocation nor resulted in its author's promotion. Can the annals of history furnish a more peculiar case of strategy, not to say criminal, statecraft than this?

THE HOLY SEPULCHER.

Public interest has once more been awakened to some extent in the subject of the true location of the holy sepulcher, by the fact that the English people have been appealed to for the contribution of £4,000 by which to purchase a spot of ground by some supposed to contain the sacred tomb. It is situated a short distance from the Damascus gate and contains about four acres. The high price is accounted for by the fact that the ground in question is in the hands of German speculators. The purchase is recommended by many leading ecclesiastics, among whom are the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops of Salisbury, Ripon and Rochester and the archbishops of London and Westminster and Professor Stuart Pool.

The question, where was Christ buried? is probably one of the most difficult ones in the whole sacred topography to answer. The cave which is now shown tourists as the holy sepulcher has a very ancient tradition in its favor. The first foundations of the beautiful structure that now covers it date at least as far back as Constantine. And yet recent explorers almost unanimously reject the claim. The sacred historian states that Christ was laid in a tomb near by the place where he was crucified, and no place near by this grave seems to answer the description of Calvary. It is further argued that a place of execution could not have been within the city walls, as this grave is and probably always has been, and that, consequently, the grave must be looked for somewhere farther north. To this argument, the reply is, however, that the grave actually does exist within the walls, and if it could be made there at all, it might certainly be the one which belonged to Joseph of Arimathea and in which the body of the Savior was laid, as well as not. Calvary might have been situated outside the walls and the grave inside and yet be near by that place of execution, since the distance in reality is not very considerable. But, as has been already stated, the best biblical scholars reject the tradition as without foundation in fact.

A writer, while visiting Jerusalem a couple of years ago, heard from a venerable Jewish rabbi, a resident of the holy city, a curious account of the origin of the tradition. His statement may be given for all it is worth. When the city, he said, was destroyed by the Romans, most of the Christians fled. The old inhabitants of the city who had been eye-witnesses to the events recorded in the New Testament were scattered. Some were slain; others were driven into exile. Strangers came in who did not care to know anything about the places considered sacred by the despoiled and conquered inhabitants, and in this way with the lapse of a century or so, all certain knowledge of these places was lost. Ruins covered everything and made it next to impossible to tell explorers to recognize such places of which historians have given descriptions previous to the terrible destruction. A couple of centuries thus rolled on and nobody took any interest in the spot where a supposed criminal once had been executed and buried. It was first at the time of Constantine, when Christianity had become a power in the state and the Christians commenced to breathe the air of liberty, that pious men and women performed pilgrimages to the holy land and searched the country for Calvary, the sepulcher, the place of nativity, etc. The Empress Helen, the mother of Constantine, conceived the idea of finding the sepulcher and she consequently went to Jerusalem. She thought that the few Jews who then resided there, knew where the grave was and she earnestly inquired, but always met with the answer that nobody knew. The empress ascribed this to perverseness of the Jews and thought they did know, but refused to tell because they hated the Nazarene. She therefore commanded her soldiers to seize an old Hebrew and gave them power to torture him and even kill him, if he persisted in refusing to divulge the secret of which she thought he was in possession. He was accordingly seized and led about in the streets and commanded to go to the place where the grave was. No protestation, no excuse would be accepted. He had either to find the grave or be tortured to death. In his great distress he earnestly prayed to a Heavenly Father to be delivered from his tormentors, and while thus mentally engaged, he came to a cave. Then, as by a sudden flash of inspiration, he exclaimed, here is the grave you are seeking for! and was subsequently liberated. This was given as the reason there was to the tradition. The empress immediately consecrated the place and built a church over it.

The Catholic tradition is more in harmony with the genius of that church. According to Eusebius, whose reliability as a historian is not of the highest reputation, Constantine was led to explore the place and found the cave which he supposed to be the holy sepulcher. The grave, of course, his Imperial mother had a revelation according to which the three crosses were found near the grave, which miracle identified the place beyond a doubt. Tradition has further ornamented this story by adding that she discovered the genuine cross by piling a dead body on it, which immediately was revived. But aside from these fabulous stories, it is but just to say that one thing speaks for the genuineness of the place, notwithstanding the arguments against it. It is related in history that the Emperor Hadrian built a Venus-temple over the grave in order to hide it from those who held the place in veneration. This temple still existed in the days of Constantine, if it was built at all, and he had in this structure a sure guide where to seek the tomb and find it.

The place which now is to be sought is known as the Garden tomb. General Gordon thought it to be the genuine one and his view has been accepted by Hackett Smith and others. But Major Conder rejects the theory altogether. He explored the cave in 1878 and came to the conclusion that its construction does not date farther back than to the ninth century.

Another place is known as Conder's tomb, but the evidence of its being the genuine grave is insufficient to that adduced for any other spot. The only safe conclusion so far is, that the grave of Christ has probably not yet been found. Perhaps it never will be, unless it should be the pleasure of the Lord Himself to reveal it to somebody in the future.

The awakened interest among the nations in the land of promise is, however, a gratifying sign to those who believe in a glorious future for that country. Not many years ago it was despoiled. Now it attracts attention. It has already begun to blossom as a rose in the wilderness. It seems to be under preparation, by the hand of Providence, to receive the inhabitants to whom it belongs. Its gates are being opened; its cities are being rebuilt; its ruins are being removed. The curse is surely lifted, and blessings are being poured down like the early rain and late rains which again make the country a beautiful garden as of old.

THE DARK CONTINENT MANIA.

The North Pole mania has its counterpart in the recently developed craze for interior African exploration, one being about as hazardous as the other to the unaccompanied novice. Stanley made quite a respectable fortune and no little fame out of his exploits, but it is generally admitted that he was unusually fortunate. The interior of Africa, especially the equatorial regions, are as full of dangers to the one whose tissues have been seasoned to the temperate zone only as would northern Greenland be to the average schoolboy. Yet such expeditions are not only taking place but numerously so. We are now advised that a large number of prominent Frenchmen, Austrians, Englishmen and Germans are at present either on their way to Africa or already marching into the interior. On the west coast the young Duke d'Udese, whose extravagance has caused him to be deprived of the right of administering his fortune, which has been invested in the hands of trustees, is endeavoring to reach the Victoria Nyanza from the Congo. In his party there are said to be about about half a dozen young Frenchmen of rank and family. Inasmuch as the duke of Orleans hopes to reach the Victoria Nyanza from the east coast, it is possible that they may all meet on the shores of that lake. What they all expect to accomplish, it is doubtful if even themselves could tell. The French expedition militant, headed by General Dodds, has been successful in one respect, that is, the dusky King Behanzin and his Amazonian phalanx have been defeated and his capital is in possession of the invader; but the monarch hasn't, like Josh Billings' moquito, wasn't there when the head descended upon him. If France will now count up its profits and losses and let the world know how it stands, there will be so much of interest in it at least.

"WILDCAT" CURRENCY AGAIN.

Notwithstanding that the phantasm of "wildcat" banking and worthless state issues has been thoroughly dissipated, and that there can be no possibility be any further political capital gained by such means now, there are some eastern papers which let go of the subject with the greatest deliberation, not to say regret. The Milwaukee Sentinel, for instance, recently presented its readers with a doleful account of the evils of the state currency system as it was thirty-two years ago, when 1547 bank failures occurred in less than ninety days, and went on to say:

The bank currency of Wisconsin was subject to the common lot. Bank failures were of frequent occurrence during the years 1856, '57, '58 and '59; the list of discredited banks grew longer from week to week, and the climax was reached in the spring of 1861. The Milwaukee banks became flooded with discredited bank notes. Accordingly the bankers of this city met and decided to throw out ten banks from the list of seventy which had been passed on favorably at the April convention. Such action was taken on Saturday, June 21. The workmen had just received their weekly wages, and on reading over the list of the ten banks thrown out they discovered that most of the money paid them was in bills of the discredited banks. They had already been subject to sufficient loss by the uninterrupted encroachment of bank failures, and the new discovery completely exhausted their patience. On the following Monday there was a riot, which is still remembered by many eye witnesses.

This might have had an effect during the campaign, but as a salaried seer not to any practical extent, perhaps for the reason that it endeavors to create prejudice out of improper materials. It was not altogether that the currency was the issue of state banks that caused the trouble spoken of, but chiefly the imminence of the great war of the rebellion, which unsettled values and undermined securities of all kinds. Indeed, if the national government itself had had paper money afloat it would have shared the same fate and later have been held up to the same execration by those who held it when the crash came, as was the case with the notes coming from the state banks. It was a time of general panic, as was the year 1857, though from vastly different causes, albeit the war shadow was beginning to be seen upon the land even then.

Unstable, insecure money, or rather bills passing for money, cannot be too severely frowned down anywhere. It does not, however, appear that we are now in any danger from that source, notwithstanding the financial plank of the Democratic platform; its endorsement by the people and its authorship alone should, we think, be a sufficient guarantee in the right direction, as was exhaustively shown in a recent issue of the News.

THE FORTHCOMING MESSAGE.

The death of President Harrison's father-in-law was given as a reason for the probable lateness of the annual message a few days ago; now we have the announcement that it will not be detained at all, but will be sent to Congress by Tuesday next at the latest. There is more than usual interest in the forthcoming document, for several reasons, prominent among which is that it is the last of the kind Mr. Harrison will ever prepare, and therefore may partake somewhat of the nature of a valedictory; also that it may exhibit some traces of the contending emotions with which his bosom has been filled of late. However that may be, it will undoubtedly be a patriotic, capable document.

A Washington correspondent, who claims to be in a position to know, says the message will naturally make few recommendations for legislation, but his resume of the condition of public business will be such as to show that the administration, in giving up power, has no regrets. The President will make it clear that the legislation which the people seem to want should come from the party that will soon be in complete power. In discussing the financial conditions he will indirectly answer some of the partisan criticisms that are heard about the condition of the treasury, and is likely to point out wherein the expenditures of the government have grown. He may recommend the suspension of further payment on public works until the public finances justify it; at the same time will probably show how the expenditures are in excess of the revenues, because of the removal of the sugar tax, and leave it to the people to judge whether they want the tax removed. In other words, accepting this correspondent's prefiguring as correct, the President will implicitly if not directly ask that the policy outlined by the Democratic national platform and which the people have just endorsed by 627,000 plurality, be given full force and effect, to the end that if faulty its practical application will develop its faults and thus the remedy can be supplied later; whereas, if not put to the crucial test, the experiment which the people have elected to try will not have been given the opportunity which would be satisfying to them. There should be no fault-finding, it would seem, over such suggestions, being so clearly in line with the requirements and wishes of so great a preponderance of the voters.

The question which we of the Far West are concerned in more, perhaps, than any other, is that of silver. The correspondent advises us on this head that there has been some discussion over the advisability of the President recommending the repeal of the Sherman silver law, on the ground, that it has served its purpose. Such a recommendation, we are advised, would have a good effect on the international monetary conference now in session in Brussels. The silver states have shown by their votes that the Sherman law is not satisfactory to them, and as the rest of the country never demanded it the President, it is claimed, cannot but be in accord by recommending its repeal. It is not absolutely certain that he will do so, yet there are said to be indications that he leans to such a recommendation. It does begin to look, however, as though the conference might forestall the President in this important matter; certainly it seems as if silver were about to advance several points in the scale and remain there, and whether the result shall be accomplished by congressional or international action or by both does not so much matter.

We are informed that the cholera epidemic will be discussed, and Congress will be advised to legislate more specifically, possibly to the establishment of a national quarantine. While power was found for the executive department, the desirability of having this power clearly defined, we are told, points to a national quarantine as the safest way of avoiding conflict with local health officers and of making the quarantine effective for the whole country. Immigration naturally grows out of the cholera discussion, and on this point the advisability of Congress defining the position of this country will probably be shown. President Harrison, it is claimed, will not recommend the total prohibition of immigration for ten years, as some have advised him to do, but he will emphasize the necessity of further restriction than is now imposed.

Having come so near to what the Chief Magistrate intends placing before the Senate and House of Representatives in the way of suggestions and recommendations, there does not seem to be much left to look for except, perhaps, in the way of review; and as to this and all the rest of it for that matter, it might be as well to wait for the document itself. President Harrison has a habit at times of keeping his own counsel and of doing and saying things to suit himself. The News will publish the message entire when it comes.

THAT VEXED QUESTION.

It is astonishing how often questions regarding the manner of choosing the President and Vice President are asked, there being scarcely a newspaper in the land a year old but what has been requested to furnish such information at least once, some of them several times. One cause, perhaps, is the fact that those who essay the task of answering do not always take the trouble of looking up the points concerning which information is desired, and thus the questioner, sooner or later, finds that he is in possession of instruction which does not instruct. The Ogden Standard, of Wednesday, contained a response to a question of the kind spoken of, consisting of an extract from Johnson's epitome of the constitutional and legal provisions upon the subject, of which the following is a part:

The Constitution ordains that the electors shall meet in their respective states on the first Wednesday in December, and vote by ballot for President and Vice President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves; and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, etc., and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify and transmit sealed to the seat of government of the United States, directed to the president of the Senate. The electors of all the states constitute the electoral college. A majority of the whole number of electoral votes is necessary to elect the President and Vice-President. They meet at the capitals of their respective states. The electoral votes are opened and counted on the second Wednesday of February by both houses of Congress, which meet in the chamber of the Representatives. In the actual mode of performing their duty the electors do not exercise any judgment or discretion, and therefore are called the President and Vice-President, but cast their votes for the candidates previously nominated by their party, usually in a national convention.

If the Standard writer had relied upon his own mind and ability to answer, instead of trusting implicitly to other authority, he would not have been guilty of the blunders which are thus given to a confiding reader in the guise of information. The first statement in the extract is untrue, as the Constitution does nothing of the kind; it mentions no time when the electors shall meet, leaving that to the law-making power, which has provided that the electors shall meet at the time stated. The second sentence states but a small part of the case, in that it fails to show that the certificates are made out in triplicate and does not show by what means they reach the seat of government; one set is sent to the President of the Senate by mail, another set goes to him by a special messenger chosen by the electors, and the third is filed in the United States court for the district in which the election has been held. The statement that the electors meet at the capitals of their respective states is not necessarily correct, the Constitution providing that they meet at such place as the legislature may direct; and the assertion that the electors exercise no judgment or discretionary power but vote for the candidates of their party previously nominated, is misleading at least. The electors are not compelled by any law (except party fealty) to vote for anybody who may be nominated; they are presumed to be utterly unbiased in their action and in their united judgment to select such men as are presumably fittest. The fact that they have on nearly every occasion of late years voted for the men previously nominated by the national convention of their party does not show that they are bound to do so by any means; and the implication that they act like so many marionettes, simply registering the will of their party, has a tendency to deprive the exalted station of a presidential elector of its importance and dignity and to make of the solemn act of voting simply the enacting of a role in a not very serious drama. It conveys a wrong impression and is therefore not information at all.

The News recently published a lengthy article in response to a question on this subject, basing its reply on a little book issued at home and written by a resident of Utah, entitled "The Practical Politician." The features of that reply will be found to be correct in every instance, as does not appear to be the case at all times with those which come from abroad.

THE LESSON OF HOMESTEAD.

The collapse of the great strike at Homestead is an object lesson to the wage-workers of the United States which they cannot afford to overlook, and admonishes them once more that attempting to coerce capital by means of violence is simply playing with fire—that to try coercion at all is vain and disastrous. No matter whether the workers for Carnegie and Frick had just cause for organized or other protest against their treatment, it is shown that they have, as is invariably the case, lost the fight and incurred a long and serious train of disasters besides.

The press of the country, while mainly denouncing Pinkertonism and Pinkertens, have only words of cold comfort for the unfortunate strikers, where they express anything comforting at all. The following lines from the New York Press are a fair sample of what the majority say:

The great strike at Homestead is at an end. It cost thirty-five lives, more than $1,500,000 in wages, and fully as much more to the Carnegie company. Was it worth the price? Has it made living easier, homes brighter, or the cause of organized labor stronger? If not—somebody has blundered.

This would seem to present the picture about as vividly as a few words can, and it is done in a manner as impressive as devoid of passion or rancor. The Cincinnati Post gives us another style of comment, resorting to a mixture of facetiousness and sarcasm:

Let's see! Was there not a strike at Homestead? Who made any money by it? That is, who will give thanks because of that strike? The workers? The Pinkertons? The national guard? I am! The Keystone state? Carnegie? President Harrison? Who did you say? Louder if you please.

But by far the most if not the only encouraging words are from the New York World's review of the case, as follows:

It would be a grateful outcome of the whole affair, if the episode having passed into history, lessons in mutual forbearance and consideration could be read from it, by both capital and labor.

It will be a great era in our national history when we attain the lofty ground of settlement of disputes—especially labor disputes—upon the broad ground of fairness to both sides, and by appeals to intelligence, justice and reason. To accomplish this it may be necessary for both to concede something; but surely concessions, even when involving financial loss and the sacrifice of some desirable considerations, could never approximate the ruin, the loss to all the parties engaged and the embittered feeling which the Homestead affair produced; and the end is not yet.

HE WANTS TO KNOW.

ELSMORE, NOV. 29, '02.

Editor Deseret News:

Will you please answer the following question through your paper: If the president and trustees of an incorporated town receive the commissions from the governor, but fail to give bonds as the law requires, are their official acts legal and binding? Respectfully,

E. P. MARQUARDSON.

Officers who occupy such a position are known as de facto incumbents; that is, they exercise the power and hold the places without a legal title, but to prevent injurious results to those for whom they act and avoid the annoyance and confusion that would result from invalidating their acts, the same are given legal effect. This does not apply to cases where authority or jurisdiction has been exceeded; nor would the officers under such circumstances have a right to act if there were an old board, that is one that had preceded them, as such board, in the absence of proper qualification by the new, would hold over and they alone would have the authority to act officially. Summed up, the answer is: If this is the first set of officials the town has chosen, their acts are valid until others properly chosen and qualified take their places; if not, then they have no right to act, the old set alone having that power.

LOUD ADVERTISING POSTERS.

There is no doubt, says the Boston Herald, that illustrated advertising by means of show bills in the streets has been abused in the privileges afforded by it. A good rule in this respect to adopt would be to place there no picture that would not be allowed in the columns of a reputable newspaper. The whole system of street advertising is a great expense to the proprietors of theaters, and it probably might be curtailed to a considerable degree without pecuniary loss on their part. Some of them are good specimens of pictorial art and some are a long way from it, being as unseemly and unworthy as they are at times vulgar and even indecent. Show printing has become a distinct branch of the business, and it ought to be conducted in a legitimate and inoffensive manner; but it is not, always as the bill boards and dead walls of this city too often attest.

TAKE THINGS MODERATELY.

The injunction to be moderate in all expressions and temperate in all actions is a standing one, but the proneness of mankind to ignore it becomes more apparent every day. In nothing is this more pronounced than in the social enjoyments and pastimes which prevail where there are any considerable number of people living in proximity, and the larger the community the greater and more nearly continuous the indulgence in sensuous pleasure as a rule. The devotee of "society" is rarely found in the villages and smaller towns, but becomes apparent in the smaller cities and more numerous by rate as the population increases; and in the latter class of cases the demand is too often for an all but incessant whirl of gaily garnished with blasing costumes and set to the pace of unappeasable demand.

It is not that we should be sober and serious and matter-of-fact all the time; nor is there any need that we be so want and becoming attire, or that we keep away from places of amusement altogether. This represents the other extreme, and extremes are what we are protesting against. Amusement should be a means of mitigating the ascerbities of life, of imparting relaxation to the mind and of creating pleasurable though innocent diversion; it should not be as it is in too many cases, the sole aim and end of life. Those who would make of this existence an endless round of pleasures are cultivating an appetite which grows by what it feeds on. The keen enjoyment of yesterday becomes the dull monotony of today and must be sharpened and added to in order that it may be again relished, and thus it goes till the appetite for enjoyment is sated, nothing gives pleasure any longer, and the world becomes a gloomy vale with all things in it dull, uninteresting and even repugnant.

It is as proper to attend a theatrical exhibition where vice and immorality are excluded, as it is to read a chapter from a useful book; while it is as improper to permit the mind to be constantly immersed in theaters and things theatrical to the exclusion or even curtailment of the practical things of life, as it is to do anything else which has a tendency to impair our usefulness. Our minds should amount to something more than a mere receptacle for sensational, fanciful and unreal impressions, and we feel should at all times walk the paths of righteousness even when "treating the measures" of a dance; but the minds which find no time for the contemplation of religion, philosophy, science and the events of the hour, and the feet which are trained only in the exercises of the ball room, are a reproach to the Giver and the receiver alike. Be moderate, be circumspect, and above all remember the time to come.

JAY GOULD IS NO MORE.

Jay Gould, the Midas of real life, the wizard of Wall street, and one of the greatest financiers in point of successful operations the world ever knew, is no more. He had been ailing for several days, yet a favorable turn now and then suggested the possibility of his weathering the storm, but it was not so to be, and at a quarter past nine o'clock this morning his spirit took its flight. The cause of death was consumption. He was about 60 years of age.

Gould was immensely wealthy; what his exact possessions were will probably never be known, certainly not by the public. So much of it was in stocks of various kinds that it naturally fluctuated all the time, and the announcement of his death will cause something of a depression all along the line, though this may be only momentary. It is quite safe to say that his possessions in cash and property convertible into cash would not fall short of $100,000,000. We believe there are no Gould institutions of learning, orphan asylums, themes for the unfortunate indigent, public libraries or educational endowments, and yet he may have done good by stealth. Certainly in his business transactions he was thorough, masterly and met his engagements in accordance with the terms thereof. The Christianity of man is his saving quality, and it is no more than charitable to oversee the Latin maxim—de mortuis nil nisi bonum—and say nothing but good of the dead.

SOCIAL PROGRESS.

The Boston Herald makes the point that when reference is made by some sanguine individual to the possibility of future government and social reforms, we are apt to look upon the proposition as indicative of an excited imagination and as having but little basis of possibility in the experience of mankind. But it is not improbable that those who judge of human nature and social and government institutions by what they see around them are entirely in the wrong as to the adaptability of mankind to better conditions. Mr. Froude pointed out in one of his essays that the difference between men of the present day and their predecessors in early historical times is that, while we believe that the world is improving, that there is a better time coming and that our own condition is preferable to that of our ancestors, the ancients thought that the golden age of the world, when mankind was happiest, and therefore had the best right to be contented, was in the past, and that society was deteriorating instead of improving. This is from a strictly liberal standpoint, but as an abstract proposition its truth may be accepted.

That mankind progresses in the arts and sciences, in the more abstruse departments of physical life and in the means of disseminating his impressions and information, cannot be disputed; that he has become more humane in civilized modern than in medieval times, is also undisputed. This incites our cotemporary history—a class of research that was denied to the ancients—as having been the chief cause of our belief in social progress, and this supplies us with evidence of improvements that have taken place within a relatively short space of time. For example, Mr. J. C. Jefferson has recently compiled and printed a large number of extracts from the Middlesex county (Eng.) records, these including indictments, convictions, coroner's investigations, etc., from the seventeenth year of Charles II to the fourth year of his successor, James II; that is, at a period of about 200 years ago. One obtains a tolerably fair idea from the crimes committed, from their character, who committed them and the punishment accorded for them, of the social conditions of the people, and, taking a few of them as samples, the condition of England 200 years ago would seem as impossible to Englishmen of today—if it were not for historical proofs that can be furnished—as the conditions foreshadowed by some of the most radical social reformers.

A number of cases might be cited showing the intolerance, cruelty and oppression of those in authority toward their subjects in those times, but these are individual instances illustrative of the law's delay or inaction in dealing with one class and its rigorous promptness and severity in dealing with another class, a condition which this age has modified somewhat, but who has the hardihood to say that it has entirely overcome it? The publication of the record entire would add nothing to the general proposition nor take anything from it, so there is no point gained by the repeated reference made to cruelty and wrong-doing in the days ago. One more instance, however, being valuable as a feature of those times and people, may be given:

Another offense which those records show to have been very prevalent was that of kidnapping young women, who were seized near the water side, put on board ship and sent to the West Indies to be sold as slaves to the planters. Judging by the number of persons, both male and female, who were convicted of the offense of kidnapping, the crime of thus depriving one's fellow-citizens of their liberty and all that made life enjoyable was astonishingly prevalent in England two centuries ago. Apparently, the punishment for this offense was entirely incommensurate with its enormity. Occasionally, the offenders were heavily fined, and were ordered to go and to seek out the persons who had been kidnapped, but in many cases the kidnappers escaped with a fine of a few shillings.

But surely we of this generation do not have to wander so far back on the backward way of time to find incidents of kidnapping for the purpose of selling into slavery, or of indignities and outrages—even crimes—committed upon the victims of that dastardly business. As a plain matter of fact we don't have to go back at all; current history furnishes us with such events now and then, growing fewer and fewer let it be thankfully said, but not yet obsolete. In such light the summing up of our able and always brilliant Boston cotemporary loses something of its force. "From this and other evidence that could be given," it concludes, "we are made aware of the immense distance in social condition and restraint that separates those who lived 200 years ago from those living at the present time. Our progress in this brief space of time has been made toward greater equality and the better protection of individual rights and happiness, which, being the case, one has a right to argue that changes equally great may take place in the years that are to come; for, be it remembered, it is not alone that official guardianship is exercised at the present time, and that individual rights are respected under the law, but the offenses then committed, and the punishments then bestowed are, many of them, of a character which would be considered abhorrent by those now living, even if there were no legal restraint imposed." Certainly, 200 years hence and even much less time will bring upon the earth and the children of the earth many changes, changes of more import and greater extent than are set down in the vocabulary of man.

If it wasn't so much trouble to transport furniture, there would probably be economy in moving south for the winter rather than buy coal at the present rates.

A VILE IMPOSITION.

The superstitious negroes of Chicago—and where they are ignorant they are as a rule densely superstitious—are being practiced upon in a manner calling loudly for the intervention of the law; yet the officers make no interference, although they not only know of the impostors' tricks but have them practiced right before their eyes in the police court if nowhere else. He is named "Professor" James J. Allen; he occupies pretentious apartments in the outskirts and makes no secret of his whereabouts, in fact he prefers to have it known because of the increased business coming to him thereby, and to that end has his name on the door in big gilt letters. His customers are mainly those who want fortunes told or seek to avoid some threatened evil. He has a bigger police court practice than any of the lawyers, those who are "run in" employing him to ward off impending justice or injustice as the case may be; when he has a case of this kind he takes a seat by the side of the accused and, as the latter makes his statement to the judge, the long, bony fingers of the wizard sprinkle some substance over the prisoner and, strange to relate, the "charm" is successful oftener than otherwise.

Allen is said to be fairly educated; he speaks English, French, German and Latin moderately well, and is making a fortune. His charges are very high and he is visited by hundreds every day. The papers of the lake city discuss this matter as though it were a harmless imposition with which they can only interfere to the extent of giving it clear repertorial notice; but it wears a more serious aspect thus far away.

THE RAINMAKERS.

Science wielded by learned men and backed by the federal government has been brought into requisition to assist those occupying the arid regions of the country by compelling rain to fall where it has all along refused to do so, at least in sufficient volume to amount to anything practically. To this end Congress made a big appropriation last session, and a corps of capable men headed by General Dyrenforth has been bombarding the upper deep at a point near the famed Alamo in Texas, with what success those of our readers who keep an eye on the telegraphic dispatches already know; that is, no success whatever worth naming.

While the general and his gunners, balloon men, gasmakers, cannon and magazine stores are pounding away at the impalpable air, the Chicago Record gives an account of the adventures of another American manufacturer of thunderstorms who has been among the farmers of Hungary. The "professor," whose field of operations has removed him from his own country, explained to interested farmers near Pesth that rain is produced by lightning. This bit of natural science having been honored with full credence, the next step was to show that by setting traps for the valuable product, catching it and corking it up in casks specially prepared for its reception, the farmers could have rain for their crops whenever they wanted it. After the hard-working scientist had captured fourteen full-grown thunderbolts and stored them away for future use the police of Hungary interrupted his labors and sent him to jail.

These alleged rain-makers seem to be not in the least overcome by the utter failure of their plans and workings so far, and evidently think that with persistence the missing link in the chain of natural science necessary to success will be developed. Meantime the unthinking—and a good many who are not unthinking—of the populace are disposed to weaken in their faith regarding the experiments; that is, those who ever had any faith in them are doing so, and rapidly joining the other class where the salutation of each announcement of failure is the quite familiar one—"I told you so!" But still the experiments go on and will probably continue so long as the appropriation lasts. We are advised by one of the more facetious that on Saturday last General Dyrenforth, unterrified by the prospect that it would rain presently without his aid, filled a balloon with a hydrogen-oxygen mixture and sent it sailing up into a black cloud, where it exploded, precipitating a heavy shower, which presently turned into a steady and long-continued drizzle, which leads to the conclusion that while the explosive balloon is a great deal more honest than the lightning trap, it still remains to be proved that the rain-making powers of the former are superior to those of the latter.

There are a good many places in Utah that would be converted from unproductive wastes into fruitful fields if the golden secret sought by Dyrenforth and claimed by Melbourne could be attained and its principle applied. The idea that concussion would bring aerial moisture to its vicinity was caused by the fact that it has been known to rain quite copiously on a battlefield just after a severe battle; but this has not always been the case by any means, and it would seem that if the conditions overhead must be propitious, in which event the rain would come sooner or later anyway, the concussions having but the effect of hastening matters a little.

SPEED THE WORK!

It is to be hoped the movement initiated by Mayor Haekin to have a People's railroad to one of the coal fields will take root and grow without delay. It is here to be noted, to his honor's great credit, that he has done his full part toward preventing rascality and fraud in the dealings of the combine, and been foremost on all occasions when securing decent treatment to the people was the object in view; it was, therefore, peculiarly fitting that he be the head of a movement looking to the complete emancipation of the public from the increasing thralldom in which they have been held by the unscrupulous monopoly for years. Let him go ahead, and there will be a movement to sustain him such as will amount, in effect, to unanimity.

There is no serious difficulty in which a community may be involved but what there is a way out of it, and the coal question hereabout is the most serious one that has beset Salt Lake City of late years. The article spoken of is one of the prime necessities of life; it is absolutely indispensable. Time was when none was used here, but that was in the days when business was sluggish and our young men had ample time during the summer to get together a winter's supply of wood from the canyons, which they invariably did. A revolution in this respect has taken place, and revolutions do not retrace their progress or reverse the motion of their wheels. It no longer pays to haul wood when doing so requires the hard labor of a man and two horses for perhaps three days to get one or two cords, each cord obtained putting the supply so much farther away and higher up, the question thus becoming one of how long the accessible supply will last; and the amount for which the wood will sell when obtained represents no more than a fraction of what it has cost in toil, wear and tear and property involved. Besides, to use wood requires one to be constantly replenishing the fire, some one else to be continually reducing it to proper dimensions, and in cold weather a cord of wood worth $10 would last about as long as the hauler was in bringing it. That is too primitive a condition for us now. The three days spent in hauling a cord of wood applied to teaming in the lowlands would bring at least as much and, under proper conditions, would buy enough coal to last a frugal family all winter. That is the difference, and is of itself a sufficient reply to the remedy against the coal sharks suggested by a friend yesterday, that we "freeze them out" by returning to wood for fuel. We can't do it, you know.

No, we must have coal, a thousand tons a day for six months to come. As the business is being conducted now, the profits accruing to the railroads and the combine cannot fall far short of one-half of the whole amount received, which would foot up the enormous total of at least $2,600 a day! A railroad to Coalville or any other available point would reduce the price of coal from its present figures forty per cent, thus saving the people $2,000 a day and, by keeping the market supplied, could count on at least $1,000 for itself besides! Is not such a showing all the inducement that could be asked?

The suggestion that the People's road intersect the Utah Central at some convenient point—say Kimball's ranch—is a good one, for the reason that most of the grading is already done and could be purchased cheaply; the iron, ties and rolling stock could be easily obtained and laid and the road be pouring coal into our midst on decent terms and at living rates all around before the season was half over. It only needs a master spirit in the lead, backed by sufficient capital to complete the road; this would be so slight comparatively and the profits upon the investment so large inevitably, that the enterprise should arise from its paper bed and walk forth fully materialized at once. Let the agreement between all concerned and with any other company whose rails or a part thereof may be utilized, be a stab-and-twist, copper-riveted and brass-boned one, so that once freed from the clutches of the combine we may then proceed and forever after be free.

It is a condition, not a theory, that we have to deal with.

THE BOOK OF MORMON.

An article, headed "Criticism of the Old Testament," appears in the October number of the Edinburgh Review. In it the author asks, Are Christians justified in the belief that honest criticism and diligent inquiry into the difficulties avowedly connected with sacred writings tend to strengthen the faith in their divine genuineness and authenticity? This question he endeavors to answer by laying down the proposition that the Biblical books must be viewed from Calvary as the central point of sacred history, in the same manner as our part of the universe must be viewed from the sun and not from the earth as the center of this planetary system.

"Viewed in this way," we are told, "the Bible becomes the most interesting of all books. It is no longer a magical and infallible oracle verbally and syllabically inspired; but a perfectly veracious and divinely simple record of the growth and development of God's church—from the beginning down to the apostolic age—describing in full its suggestive essays in organization, its failures and its victories, its achievements of saintly and heroic; giving in perfect good faith its legends of Jonah and his whale, of Balaam and his ass, of Samson and his lion; and weaving in many lovely myths and dreams and poems—the angels' ladder, the rainbow covenant of hope and peace for animals as well as men, the garden of sweet innocence and of sad primeval fall."

About the proposition here laid down, very little need be said. It seems to contain contradictions of very glaring nature. The author evidently feels concerned about the difficulties in the Scriptures and therefore tries to turn the whole structure upside down so as to hide these from view. But in so doing, he still finds that the records are "not infallible" and yet "perfectly veracious"—presenting, it seems, a difficulty still more unsolvable than any which he removes. For, how can a record be at once fallible and perfectly veracious? One more instance of the helplessness of modern theology.

Incidentally, the author states that the Book of Mormon is "beneath criticism," and this groundless statement should, for the sake of truth, be emphatically contradicted.

The trouble is, the world refuses, as a general rule, to read the Book of Mormon with a view to honest criticism. It has become almost an axiom with the so-called scholars of the world that that sacred record cannot bear close investigation. It has been viewed through the hazy mists of prejudices and denied a fair, impartial hearing. It has been doomed, among the thousands of Christian confessors, to the same fate to which the Bible is subject among the infidels. Nothing is more strange than this. For those who accept the Book of Mormon invite investigation and maintain that if this record must be rejected, the Bible must be rejected, too. And if one is accepted as divine, both must be accepted. The two must stand or fall together.

To prove this statement in full would not be possible within the limits of this article, but one point or two may be offered for consideration. Mr. M. T. Lamb, who is about the only one who has attempted to handle the Book of Mormon critically—and he does it only in order to pull it to pieces—may conveniently be referred to in this brief investigation.

His first objection is that God's hand cannot be traced in the book. To him it is blundering, stupid, etc. This is no doubt true with regard to all who read this sacred record with unbelief, unkind heart and prejudiced mind. But what is the fact in regard to the Bible? Can Ingersoll trace the hand of God in it?

The fact that an unbeliever cannot see the hand of God in a book, does not prove that God is not the author. The question is whether the Book of Mormon gives enlightenment and consolation and hope to those who study it with hearts prepared for the truths it contains. And to this fact thousands can testify. Many are unable to trace the hand of a Creator even in nature, but that does not prove that nature has no divine Creator. To the thoughtful mind every flower, every leaf, every little beautiful insect is a poem of divine authorship. So with the Bible and the Book of Mormon. The hand of God is everywhere traceable.

Another objection is the grammar of the sacred volume. "That all might see the writing which he had wrote upon the rent" is given as an instance of bad grammar, and it is seriously argued that God could never have inspired that. Well. The fact is that the same objection might be applied to the Bible. In the Revelation of John for instance we read that the Revelator heard a great voice as of a trumpet, "and I turned to see the voice." (Rev. 1, 12.) When we accept—as all Christians do—that God inspired the words "to see the voice," it is not difficult to accept the inspiration of the first quoted expression. Inspiration does not mean that the Almighty uses the inspired man as a machine, a typewriter, as it were. It means that the divine mind operates through the human mind, moving the inspired person to act, speak, think or feel for the time being in harmony with God. But in this operation the faculties of man are the instruments used. Hence the perceptible results of inspiration must necessarily partake to some extent of the individuality of the person inspired. This is exemplified everywhere in the Bible. The student will notice the difference between the language of David, the king, and Amos, the shepherd; Paul, the flaming orator and keen logician, and Peter, the unlearned fisherman. Now, it is not known that God ever selected his inspired servants with reference to their linguistic abilities. On the contrary, He had regard to other and more important qualifications.

Thus it happened that the Son of God chose as His messengers, men whose rural dialect and ungrammatical provincialisms excited the ridicule of the educated Jews; and thus it also happened that Joseph Smith was honored with the commission to give to this age the most remarkable record in existence, and this at an age when he had as yet acquired no learning as the world understands it. That his individuality should to some extent be stamped upon the record he translated by divine inspiration, is as natural as that the individuality of the authors of the Bible should be found on the books they wrote. If Joseph Smith must be rejected as a prophet because he was no scholar, Peter and John and others must be rejected, too.

Every objection that can be raised against the Book of Mormon finds its true counterpart among the objections raised against the Bible. It is well to reflect on this. For the Bible has been successfully vindicated on rough all ages as the word of God. To the believer it has always carried its evidence with it, and as the history of the world has been unfolded, the evidences have multiplied. So with the Book of Mormon. To the believer the evidences of its divinity are already sufficient. But as the closing scenes of the age are being enacted, these evidences will be still more overwhelming, until the world shall have no choice but to acknowledge that God surely spoke through Joseph the Prophet.

In the meantime, honest criticism is invited. The Book of Mormon is published to the world, to be read and searched and diligently studied. Those who will do so prayerfully shall find it all that it claims to be—the word of God.

A CARNIVAL OF ROBBERY.

Chicago is luxuriating in a carnival of robbery, if such an expression may be allowed. One of the papers with a mildness of tone suggestive of timidity pronounces it a "fad," like the rage for phrygianisms or the craze for playing the races. It says the suburban residents find themselves mixed up rather unpleasantly in this system of levying a tax on a citizen for graciously permitting him to live. While they resent such interference with their simple pleasures and hasten to pursue the highwaymen down interminable roads and through romantic bypaths with weird instruments of retaliation ranging from shotguns to hayforks, the marauders have escaped pretty well up to date. A number of instances are given, in which peaceable citizens pursuing their daily course have been "held up" and subjected to gross annoyance and even fright in some cases, while the danger in being mistaken for a highwayman by the ever vigilant guardians of the peace is perhaps greater than the other. In fact, we are informed that the robberies, though numerous, have been singularly unprofitable. Whether the suburban resident, after settling his winter's coal bill and purchasing his commutation ticket, has little loose change remaining to turn over in forced loans to chance acquaintances in masks, or whether those armed adventurers are pursued by desperate luck, is not quite clear.

So common and audacious have the robberies or attempted robberies become that a general cleaning out of the thieves and miscellaneous rascals is demanded, "from the slender pick-pocket and sneak-thief to the brawny Abram man and sand-bagger," and it is further declared that that "vast community and its environs cannot submit longer to be harried by picturesque ruffians, whether they go on foot, on horseback or in chaises." Robbers in chaises are a new development in the practice of the "gentlemen of the road," and it has remained for the city of great enterprises to introduce that grotesque method of plunder to the world.

That such a state of things should prevail just at a time when all of civilization and a few more are about to congregate at the lake city, is ominous at least. If highwaymen occupy their vocation under normal circumstances and meet with so little discouragement that the business grows apace, and that, too, when it is evidently carried on by tyros and hangers, what may we expect when the place is swarming with visitors each and every one of whom has more or less money and while expecting robbery of another and more systematic kind, is not in the least prepared for a request to "halt and hand over" while peaceably threading the thoroughfare? Just fancy what a modern Dick Turpin or Claude Duval with a few well-trained and iron-nerved pals could do! Chicago had better take on a big conviction and shake the swarms out of its recesses; such advertising will be found disastrous.

THE SILVER CONFERENCE'S WORK.

Speaking of the Brussels conference and what was likely to result from its labors, the Chicago Dispatch of Wednesday last contained a hopeful article in which it stated that "the proposals of Alfred de Rothschild have been well considered and favorably received in the financial circles of the world. The conference appointed a very able committee to consider the Rothschild proposals, and it is believed that they will be accepted by the committee and reported to the conference for adoption. The conference will very likely agree to them, with some modifications. One will undoubtedly be that all gold coins below the value of twenty francs be withdrawn from circulation and replaced with silver notes. A late telegram from Brussels indicated the adhesion of the German delegates to this course." But the sequel, as arrived at by the conference yesterday, was that the Rothschild proposition was rejected by the narrow majority of one vote. The announcement was also made that the result gave the American delegates confidence, believing that they would now be able to get even better terms. We greatly fear that this is doubtful; it is idle to overlook or underestimate the potency of Rothschild in the monetary circles of Europe, and what he proposes is very apt to be looked upon by the others, or a majority of them, as the limit to which they should go; in other words, his say-so amounts virtually to an ultimatum. We naturally look for the best, but as things stand if anything better than what has been rejected by the committee is accomplished, it will be an agreeable disappointment. Of course our delegates ought to be advised as to the status, but men sometimes obtain confidence from a knowledge of what ought to be and a hope that it will be.

AN EX-EDITOR'S SATURDAY TALK.

Probably no man of modern times has occupied so large a place in the financial world, especially in the American part of it, as Jay Gould. A quiet, unobtrusive, yet very shrewd and persistent man, he has by his combinations achieved a wonderfully high position in controlling gigantic schemes and enterprises and making himself felt in the world of finance. He has accumulated during his brief life, for he was not an old man, an almost incalculable amount of wealth. Judging by the pains that have been taken for a long time by purveyors of news to let the country know concerning his wealth, it is evident that it was felt that much depended upon his life. He has not been in good health for some time. It was with a view to its improvement that he has visited Idaho for several summers past, stopping at Soda Springs part of the time, and at other springs in Idaho, hoping to derive benefit therefrom.

The news of his death, though not entirely unexpected, is still somewhat of a surprise. It suggests many reflections. Here is a man, probably the most successful financier of the age, who has devoted his entire time and talent to the accumulation of wealth and with the most successful results; but he is called away, and not one dollar of that for which he has labored so long and arduously has he taken with him! In view of this fact, it is pertinent to ask, has his life been a success? Can any man be called successful who cannot retain the fruits of his labor, but sees it slip from his grasp despite every effort he may make to cling to it? The riches he has labored for, by an immutable decree belong to the earth and by no process can they be taken from it; they can only be left here for others to enjoy.

It is among the strange peculiarities of human nature that, notwithstanding men have seen from the beginning of time, the uselessness of their piling up riches, with the hope of taking them with them or availing themselves of their benefits hereafter, so many of them will nevertheless persistently devote their entire time and attention to their pursuit. One would naturally think that, seeing as we all do, the utter futility of trying to hold on to earthly substance when death comes, mankind would turn their attention to the acquisition of those things which they can take with them and not be compelled to leave behind. The Savior illustrated this idea in the remarks which He made, when He was on the earth, to His disciples respecting earthly and heavenly treasures. He said: "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal:

"But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal:

"For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."

This was the advice of one who understood earthly and heavenly things better than any other being that ever tread the earth. Yet, though coming from such a source and sustained as His counsel is by all human experience, how few there are who take it to heart or who act upon it! As to how far the deceased financier may have taken notice of this teaching of the Savior, or how much he may have done in the way of laying up treasures in heaven, I do not know. God is his Judge. He may have done thousands of acts of kindness and philanthropy and no mention of it be made in a way to reach the public ear. It is not a safe thing to pronounce a harsh judgment upon a man as secretive as he was.

He had a brother who lived in this city, Mr. Abraham Gould, and he acquired the reputation while here of being one of the most charitable of men. He respected the rights of the poor, and, being in the coal business at a time when coal was scarce, he exhibited a fairness that was unexampled from all the poor who were brought in contact with him. If he made any discrimination between the rich and the poor, it was said to have been in favor of the latter. For aught I know his brother Jay may have been equally kind and charitable in his sphere. This I do know, that when falsehood and calumny filled the land against the people of Utah, he was their friend and was not afraid to speak of them in their true light and to defend them.

As to the teachings of the Savior on many points they find but little favor with the world generally. Even professed Latter-day Saints think some of His teachings impracticable under present conditions. They look upon them as beautiful in theory but unsuited to the every-day life of man as society is now organized. They appear to think that His instructions might be carried out in an ideal state of society such as exists in heaven; but not on the earth.

They, however, who indulge in this view are greatly mistaken. If anything can be relied upon that is said to come from a divine source, it is that the Creator designs to introduce on earth such rules and regulations for the government of human conduct as will illustrate practically the principles which the Savior taught. The more they are examined and tested by the higher light which God gives, the more philosophical and true do they appear. While it would not be wise for man to neglect earthly affairs, be inattentive to those labors by which he derives physical sustenance and comfort, at the same time it is equally foolish to devote one's entire time and attention to these affairs. Does not the experience of mankind in all ages prove that it is folly for men to spend their entire lives in piling up earthly riches? If, by any possibility, they could take these riches with them when they left, there might, perhaps, be some sense in spending life in acquiring them. But this is not the case. The advice, therefore, of the Savior is of the highest importance and embodies the most profound wisdom. When He says to mankind, "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven," Latter-day Saints have not only the words of the great Head of their Church to rely upon and guide them in relation to these matters, but the voice of humanity through all the generations of time sustains the truth of His teachings.

It is well for mankind to give some thought to other subjects and pursuits than those which pertain to this earthly existence. Man possesses what may be termed a dual nature. There is the tabernacle of flesh and bones, tangible to all our senses; but there is also a spiritual organism which, if not so tangible to the outer senses, needs equal care with the body. Under proper treatment that spiritual organism can be developed, it can be enlarged, it can be placed in possession of knowledge and of a faith which is power. It can, by proper treatment and culture, be prepared to move in an exalted sphere; or, on the other hand, it can be starved if nourishment is withheld from it, and be dwarfed and made to shrink.

There is no pursuit that has a more withering effect upon the soul of man than the pursuit of riches. It narrows up the mind, it dries up tender and benevolent feelings, it hardens the heart and unselfishness ceases to reign predominant. Latter-day Saints of all people should be free from such a passion.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

In its forecast of what President Harrison's message would contain, the News was not greatly astray, as can be seen by comparison with the article on that subject which appeared in these columns a few days ago. It is a quietly partisan document, naturally upholding the Republican side of the political situation, praising its work in the past and relying confidently upon the future for further vindication. He pronounces the Democratic policy an "experiment," from which, if the country shall emerge victorious, there will be considerable disappointment of an agreeable character. Reciprocity and prosperity are placed side by side in the President's reckoning, the result where the arrangement has been effected being increased trade for the United States. The Bering dispute is proceeding toward pacific settlement, but our Canadian relations otherwise are highly unsatisfactory, all of which is laid at the door of the dominion herself through "unreasonable and unfriendly protests and objections." The good will prevailing between the two republics is mentioned, and the work of the various departments receives favorable attention.

As foreshadowed the President has a good word for silver, the hope being expressed that it will receive just treatment. In the event that the Brussels conference shall fail to effect an adjustment of the question, the belief is expressed that commercial conditions will compel those governments which now refrain from action to unite with us in the movement to enlarge the volume of the world's circulating medium. Honest money must meantime and all the time be maintained at all hazards, by which is meant of course that silver must be brought to a parity with gold and kept there before it can be coined or allowed to circulate freely. The treasury surplus, pension legislation and the public revenue generally are discussed in the President's usual line of argument on these subjects.

Altogether the message is a readable, conservative document, bristling with suggestions, seasoned with a dash of sarcasm here and there, not addicted to prolixity, and thoroughly American from beginning to end. It is perhaps the least tiresome state paper of the kind that has emanated from the executive mansion for a long time.

TRouble AMONG OUR NEIGHBORS.

Upon the political complexion of the next legislature of Montana depends the question of whether the next United States senator from that state shall be a Democrat or a Republican. The former party naturally desire a majority over all in the next Senate, that is, they want to be able to control without the aid of the People's party members, and this they cannot do without gaining one from Montana. It seems that at the election held on the 8th ult., the Democrats elected thirty-five members of the legislature, or one less than a majority, absolutely; they then laid claim to the member from Chouteau county because, as alleged, twenty or more half-breed Indians voted in one of the precincts there and were paid by the Republicans for doing it. With the vote of this precinct eliminated, the Democratic candidate could have a majority, otherwise the Republican would be elected. Having this state of affairs before them, the canvassing board threw out the vote, thus making the necessary Democratic majority in the legislature.

It may readily be understood that there is a storm of indignation and a multitude of protests against this action, and strange to say they do not all come from the Republicans; at least one Democratic paper and several prominent politicians on that side have expressed themselves as being opposed to success upon such terms, conceding the claim of their political opponents that it is illegal and unwarrantable. While wanting the senatorship badly enough, they cannot, they say, afford to uphold such practices as the exercise of judicial functions by a purely material board, especially when the remedy pointed out by law and sustained by precedent and usage is in existence and available.

In Wyoming the trouble is more complicated and serious. At the same time as that named above the citizens of our eastern neighbor voted for state officers as well as electors and a congressman. Dr. Osborne, Democrat, was chosen governor by 1800 majority, while the legislature, like that of Montana, was uncomfortably close. Here, also, a United States senatorship is in the issue. Lately the Republican canvassing board of one of the counties also went into the throwing out business with the result of giving that party a majority on joint ballot in the legislature. Then the Democrats became rampant. A coup d'état was determined upon and executed. The acting governor, Barbour, succeeded to the office ad interim by reason of Governor Warren's election to the Senate after having been chosen to the former office, and thus, holding that the election and qualification of a new governor would necessarily displace the temporary one, Dr. Osborne was on Friday last sworn in by a notary public and took office as possessor of the governor's office. His first official act was to "proclaim" himself and call upon all good citizens to sustain him; the next was to call the canvassers together for the purpose of determining how the election had gone. The board were called to meet today; whether they have done so or not is not known at the time of writing.

From these incidents it will be seen that statehood does not necessarily produce a condition of things altogether lovely. Montana, in fact, came in with an election dispute on her hands, and this kind of thing seems somewhat in the nature of an heirloom to the youthful commonwealth. Wyoming had no such introduction, but is experiencing enough of it now to amply make up for all delinquencies in that respect hitherto. Idaho, also, has been having a warmer time over election matters than any other state in the Union—Kansas always excepted.

It begins to look now as if the new administration would have to rely upon the votes of the Populist senators in order to get through anti-Republican legislation, for a while anyway.

THE VENISON SUPPLY.

The beneficent provisions of the law which guarantees immunity to the fish and game of our Territory during certain seasons of the year having gone into effect on the 1st inst. so far as pertains to deer, we violate no confidence in imparting the news that in this one matter of deer the sportsmen and the pleasures of these central counties occupy a much more favorable position than most of us are aware of. A glance at the markets during any day of the past few weeks would have been sufficient to prove that deer in plenty were found somewhere in the country, for the shops have rarely, if ever, been so well supplied; the cheapness of the venison, too, would have furnished the additional information that this happy hunting ground could not be very far distant, and that the cost of bringing the game to market must be trifling.

As a matter of fact, the hills surrounding these valleys are literally full of deer; an old hunter observed this morning that thousands of them are so near that they can and do look right at Salt Lake City every day. A number have been killed just northeast of the city cemetery; a small drove was seen to run along the north line of that enclosure less than two weeks since; while about the same time a magnificent buck ran along down the bank covering the water pipes in City Creek canyon, emerged into the valley at the Capitol grounds reservoir, gazed boldly at the broad scene before him, and bounded off gracefully toward Esplanade Peak.

Foretelling the complaint that this news would have been more interesting a fortnight ago, we maintain that the withholding of it will have the tendency to make next year's hunting still better than this year's has been; just as this year's has been incomparably better than last year's was. There is and will be game enough for all who want to hunt it and eat it if every true sportsman and every good citizen will uphold the hands of those whose duty it is to see that the wise and humane enactments known as the fish and game laws are rigidly enforced.

LET US HAVE GLASSWORKS.

For several consecutive months Salt Lake City, and thereby Utah Territory, was in possession of glass works from which was turned out as good a product of the kind as the community required, and we require as good as anybody. This useful industry was all at once brought to a close and we have since, as before, had to rely upon the handiwork of artisans in other parts of the country and the world. It is high time that not only the subject but the business itself was revived in our midst. Properly controlled and directed and with sufficient capital to give it a proper start and the needed support until returns could be had from the sales of products, it ought to pay handsomely, and we believe would do so.

The alleged fact that the glass production of the United States is declining should be an impetus rather than otherwise; as is the case with many other commercial necessities, the country does not produce as much as it requires by a considerable quantity, and if we in Utah can contrive even a little toward narrowing the gap, it would be patriotic throughout and profitable in the end for us to do so. We might restrain our ambition in this direction to the more common and cheaper lines of goods, and get up to fancy and plate glass as business and facilities would permit and circumstances require. We can't get to the top of the trade at one bound; but with so much material developed and undeveloped and the experienced and skilled labor necessary for properly carrying on the work within our midst, it would seem as though we ought to make a systematic and determined effort in that direction.

SOME SENSE IN THIS.

It gives us real pleasure to record a "freak" among election wagers when by its terms some useful purpose or even one suggestive of usefulness is accomplished. The girl who bet her hand in marriage on President Harrison's re-election thereby conferred on some—we hope worthy—young man the priceless boon of a wife; and now we are advised of one in Kensington, Pennsylvania, which, while altogether prosy and domestic in its terms, serves the double purpose of being ludicrous to the reader and of utility to the contracting parties. At the place spoken of a man and his wife became involved in a dispute as to who would be lected; finally the man, who is a Republican, proposed to his wife, who is an ardent Democrat, that if Cleveland was elected he would clear off the upper table, wash the dishes and sit at them away every evening for a year; while on the other hand, if Harrison was elected she was to shave him and shine his boots every morning. The wife readily assented, and now the ardent admirer of Harrison struggles away with the dish rag each evening, while his worthy spouse looks on with an indulgent smile. If the betting spirit cannot be overcome and those which involve some sacrifice of dignity must be made, how much better it is for the performance to take place under one's own roof than to make a public display of his weakness, his love for notoriety we may say!

INFORMATION AS TO UTAH.

E. B. L., writing to the News from Layton, Utah, asks the following questions:

How many square miles does Utah contain; and what is her population? A answer—The number of square miles is 84,970. The population, according to the last census, in 1890, was 207,906; but of course since that time there has been a very considerable increase.

"ONE OF THESE LITTLE ONES."

Life in a city has its end as well as its pleasant sides, and the carer of a newboy offers its full share of them.

A night or two ago, one of the wildest and stormiest of the year, a little urchin not more than nine years old, but energetic and shrill-voiced as the largest of his competitors, was an object of interest to a crowd of purchasers in one of our leading drug stores.

The little fellow had sold most of his papers, but two or three remained on his hands and they were wet and soiled beyond all hope of disposal. Business in his line having become dull he had crept into the store referred to, whose blazing fire and warm interior, together with an unoccupied and inviting chair near the stove, had proved too strong an attraction to be resisted. Curled up on the seat he had so timidly appropriated, tired nature soon asserted herself and he fell fast asleep. Minutes lengthened into hours, and still the boy slept on. At length the time for closing came. It was late, for drug clerks are not allowed to go home early. The sleeper must be awakened now, and the last clerk, pausing in his work of turning out the lights, gave the tired boy a gentle shake. A few more gas jets turned out, and then another shake. Finally the drowsy youth was aroused. He stretched, yawned, opened his eyes a little, and then a little more; and when he saw the crowd of spectators who were watching him, he rose sheepishly, smiled sadly and glided out into the darkness and the storm.

"That boy comes here every night and stays until the last minute," said the clerk. "If he has a home I don't believe he ever goes there. I have to wake him up and turn him out every evening, and each time he wanders away as he did tonight, as though thankful for the brief comfort I had been able to allow him."

All of which, corroborating our opening remark that life in a city has its sad episodes, suggests the further reflection that in the case cited there are either some parents whose indifference to their children is cruel, if not criminal, or there is at least one homeless wail whose condition calls for the display of some person's active sympathy and succor.

TOO MUCH SMOKE.

When the elements wage war upon us in this quiet and populous valley, a gloom sometimes overpreads the face of nature that is almost funereal, and sometimes this is the case when the air is at rest and the clouds give forth no moisture. There are several causes, principally scientific, but one is mechanical and it is with this that we would deal. We have reference to the dense volumes of smoke which are discharged from the hundred or more huge smokestacks in Salt Lake City and its environs, these being augmented in no small degree by the contributions from 25,000 ordinary chimneys, or thereabout. On any day that is ordinarily fair and there is a slight quantity of humidity in the air, the volumes of smoke hover over the city like a pall and accomplish literally what was said figuratively of the Parthian arrows—they obscure the sun. This is destructive of health and not conducive to exuberant feelings in the slightest degree.

It is recorded that the development of industries requiring the aid of great furnaces has a tendency to destroy the beauty of the places in which they are located and also to give undue business to doctors. A writer in one of the prominent newspapers of London, England, recently made a trip through the pottery districts of that country for the purpose of examining into the workmen's condition there. He found those towns, several in number, to be exceedingly dismal places to live in for two reasons—the annual dumping of hundreds of thousands of tons of rubbish around the works, by means of which the potteries have become fairly imbedded, and the vast volumes of smoke which the work occasions. Sixty per cent of the workmen die of pulmonary consumption; and while this unusually large proportion is not altogether if even principally due to the effects of smoke upon the system, there is no question that it contributes its full share to the general destruction created in the potteries.

Smoke-consumers work with reasonable success wherever they have been tried, and it would seem to be imperative that they become universal. The cost of using them cannot even approximate that of getting along without them and thus either engendering disease or accelerating it where resulting from other causes.

THE REPUBLICANS of Massachusetts demanded a recount of the vote of Boston, owing to the closeness of the race for governor, and got it. The result was that Democrats gained 371 votes over the first count.

END OF A CELEBRATED CASE.

The news columns of this paper briefly noted yesterday the final judgment in the long-pending Blythe will case in San Francisco. This, by reason of the great amount involved—some $5,000,000—the illegitimacy of the successful claimant, the social standing of the other claimants and the persistency with which it has been fought, has become a cause célèbre and justifies the use of a little space in explanation of it as well as the principles of law upon which it was finally adjudicated.

The issues were originally tried before Judge Coffey, who held in favor of Florence Blythe, the child born out of wedlock, and who is now Mrs. Hickley. Some of the other heirs appealed to the Supreme court, where, after a long and tedious hearing and much subsequent consideration, the lower court was fully sustained on Wednesday last. The points at issue and which by this ruling have become a finality and passed into the category of authoritative precedents, were—Can a child whose father resides in California and whose mother is a resident of England (where the child was born), and whose parents were married only after her birth, inherit property left by the father in California? These were presented and considered separately, the court holding substantially as follows:

First—The domicile of the mother is the domicile of the illegitimate child, and the place of birth of the child is an immaterial element.

Second—In a case of legitimation by subsequent marriage the place of marriage does not affect the question.

Third—Legitimation by a subsequent marriage depends upon the law of the domicile of the father.

Inasmuch as the deceased Blythe was domiciled in California, both at the time of the birth of the child and at the time he performed the acts which it is claimed resulted in legitimation, this question does not become an issue in the case.

Reference is made by the court to the celebrated English case of Munro vs. Munro, the defendant was a Scotch gentleman of fortune domiciled in Scotland, who while on a visit to London cohabited with an English woman domiciled in England, and a child was the result of such cohabitation. He subsequently married the woman in England, and it was held under the law of Scotland by the house of lords, sitting as a court of appeal (although, if it had been a case appealed from the English courts the decision would undoubtedly have been the same), that such a child was thereby legitimated, Scottish law providing for legitimation by subsequent marriage.

Thomas H. Blythe died in San Francisco on April 4, 1883. He came from Liverpool in 1849. He peddled for a living and by 1851 had saved up $300, with which he bought the block which subsequently became the bone of contention among his heirs and alleged heirs. He went to the mines, made a living there and let the property take care of itself, which it did to the extent of making him wealthy. He was not a moral man and at the time of his death was living unlawfully with Alice Edith Dickinson, who claimed the property on the ground that they were man and wife by virtue of an oral agreement. Blythe had been something of a rover; indeed, it is not known to this day whether that was his real name or not, there being good reasons for disbelieving it; and naturally enough a hundred other claimants sprang up from nearly as many corners of the earth, among them being a pretty little girl from "Merrie England," calling herself Florence Blythe. She set up the claim that she was the true and only daughter of the departed millionaire, her mother being Julia Ashcroft of London, who was seduced by Blythe when twenty years of age, Florence having been born in 1873. Blythe had admitted to a great many acquaintances in California that he was her father and that he intended to provide for her, as he had in fact been doing, and a number of letters from him couched in the most fatherly language did the rest.

The case was begun on the 6th of June, 1889, and was throughout one of most stubbornly contested that ever came before a court. The array of counsel alone amounted to a small army; 208 witnesses were examined and 139 depositions read. The trial before Judge Coffey consumed 658 hours, running through 228 days. Since its commencement the girl grew up to womanhood and was recently married to Fritz Hinkley, of Oakland. The $5,000,000 or more which they now find themselves in possession of will enable them to keep the wolf from the door during their lifetime, especially if they observe anything approaching economy.

TRYING TO INFLUENCE THE CONFERENCE.

A special dispatch to the Cleveland (O.) Plaindealer recently announced that a Pennsylvania inventor has discovered a process for the reduction of zinc-lead-sulphate-silver ores, "which abound in such volume in Colorado and other western silver producing states," and "which have hitherto been irreducible," and millions of tons of which, it is claimed, now lie on the dumps practically valueless. The reputed discoverer of the process is reported as saying that "the solution of the problem of how to reduce these ores will flood the market with silver."

Our contemporary is of the opinion that the possible mischief of the story may be contained in the last quotation, about deluging the land with silver, because of the effect it may have upon the Brussels conference through the embarrassment of our delegates there. It looks to us very much like it was designed for that purpose, but if so it may be regarded as "a weak invention of the enemy." There are a good many men in the Brussels conference who are afflicted with silverphobia, but it is hardly to be credited that any of them or any number of them are so destitute of judgment as to be influenced by such wild and palpably unwarrantable stories.

We agree with the Plaindealer that it is not true that there are such vast amounts of zinc-lead sulphides lying as waste at the silver mines of the west; that it is not true they cannot be reduced, and that it is a fact that they have been and are being reduced every day in this part of the world. The reduction is not, of course, as complete and economical as could be desired, and a plan whereby there would be a greater saving is a consummation devoutly to be wished; but yet the point is made that even if the Philadelphia man can do as he claims and his invention were to be successfully applied throughout the country, it would not add more than five per cent to the product of silver, if it would even come anywhere near that increase.

In Utah and its surroundings were more thoroughly interested in silver than people elsewhere are as a class. We cannot be made to see that the present depreciation of the article is through over-production, but hold it to be because of the dishonest legislation and unjust treatment to which silver has been subjected of late years. It is a source of great profit to speculators for gold to constitute the single standard of values and silver to be a subsidiary medium; these men, unfortunately, control the situation at the present time and it may be taken for granted that any kind of misrepresentation, rumor or canard that may have a tendency to keep things as they are will be forthcoming till the danger of equalization and justice is passed. It was in order that such "danger" might be precipitated and communitated that we of the West looked forward hopefully to the assembling and working of the Brussels conference; and we have not abandoned all hope yet.

THE LOGIC OF IT.

President Johnson seems to think, judging from a recent brilliant article, that a further Revelation and a New-er Testament are possibilities. New York Christian (Baptist) Enquirer.

This is just what the Mormons have claimed ever since they organized; they have, also, the new revelation and the New-er Testament—the Book of Mormon. —Chicago Christian Cynosure.

Passing by, for the nonce, the inaccuracy as to "the New-er Testament,"—why is not President Johnson right in his expectation as to further revelation, and what is there illogical in "what the Mormons have claimed ever since they organized," that new revelation has been received? Who decreed that in the latter days the mouth of God should be sealed, and He revealed will be withheld from those who walk in darkness? No passage of Holy Writ, no word issuing from the Most High, no right conception of an all-merciful and omnipotent Father can be distorted into such a declaration. Presumptuous as may appear to the unbelieving world the "Mormon claim" that the Lord has spoken in these our days, it nevertheless deserves the approbation of all true believers in a Divine Being for that it defends Him as unchangeable, and rejects the fallacy that He lacks illumination or power to treat with His children today as directly and as kindly as in the most favored of earlier ages. That the heavens have become as brass over the heads of self-wise and hard-hearted men is no argument that He who dwells on high is impotent to pierce them with the revelations of His will. Speaking only of the logic of the controversy, all the sound reasoning is on the side of the "Mormon claim." Speaking of the demonstrated results, the "Mormon claim" becomes a fact, as thousands can testify whose knowledge is built upon that rock against which even the gates of hell cannot prevail.

ALMOST AT THE BOTTOM.

Treading directly upon the heels of the announcement by Baron Rothschild in the Brussels conference, that his scheme for the "relief" of silver was withdrawn, comes the almost startling news that silver dropped two cents an ounce in the New York stock exchange. It would have been altogether startling but for the fact that we whose commercial corner stone is largely composed of silver have become seasoned to the situation and would not be greatly disconcerted if the white metal were withdrawn from the scene of its debasement altogether; the flinty and steel couch of war had become to Othello his thrice-driven bed of down through the agency of the tyrant custom, and we, like him, are becoming, if we have not already become, familiarized to the lack of consideration for and general domineering over the far West by the far East. So the drop to within half a cent of the lowest point ever reached creates no consternation and but little more than the usual degree of interest which we take in all the news of consequence.

Simultaneously with the above comes the announcement by special cable to the New York Post that the markets of London are oppressed by fears of a silver crisis. Indian and Mexican securities, because those two countries have a single standard of silver, were the features of the selling, while spot silver was scarce and hard to get. This means that (as merchandise only) the price is liable to take a jump upward at almost any time, because England produces none and must have immense quantities on hand at all times in order to meet her Indian exchanges, this amounting to a voluminous and continuous drain. We thus have an unmistakable object lesson of how it is and why it is that England unalutates the gold standard, as well as something of an insight into the policy of her American allies and abettors.

Silver is used, almost exclusively, for the settlement of English balances with India, and if those who deal in that metal here can buy it (as merchandise) for less than what England will give, they naturally make the difference for themselves; while England, getting it off on her principal principle for what it is worth and buying it over here for ten, fifteen or twenty cents on the dollar less than its worth, is reaping a steady harvest out of such transactions alone. Is it any wonder that Great Britain—exclusive of Ireland—will not have a double standard? that it will not recognize silver as money, albeit the chief currency of its people at home and abroad—excepting those of Australia only?

It thus appears that we permit ourselves to be dealt with, as regards our greatest industry, not as suggested by any natural law or correct commercial rule; but just as those who are determined to realize all there is to be made out of the business estate. And they have our Congress, the British parliament and we greatly fear the Brussels conference on their side. Under such circumstances it seems almost idle to attempt to change the status of things, and only in such circumstances as that of silver being short in the London market and the show of sharks who deal in it being threatened thereby with a temporary shrinkage in their profits, do we see or hear even a suggestion as to what we ought to do. If an indispensable article which the farmer produces in abundance becomes so common that he cannot get enough for it to return his outlay in producing it, the only thing to do is to keep it, if it will keep or can be kept, and not, by putting it out right along as usual, keep up a steady march toward impoverishment of himself and his family. Silver will keep exceedingly well and in large quantity of it in point of value can be kept in a comparatively limited area. If our producers were only so situated that they could retain their product for one short year and let England worry along with the meager and precarious supply she might be able to pick up from Mexico and other countries, the reward for the temporary embarrassment would be found in the increasing demand and consequent advance in price until, with the expiration of that time, it would be at a profitable point and probably stay there. Indeed, it is not hazardous too much to express the belief that such a course of treatment of our friends and relatives beyond the Atlantic would cure them of the silver-phobia and make them consent to a fair and honorable adjustment permanently—something they seem further from just now than ever, notwithstanding the Brussels conference. In fact, it is questionable if the conference has not done more injury than good so far, by causing the goldbugs to appreciate their peril and thus making them more determined than ever to keep silver where it is.

VERY IMPRESSIONABLE.

Bridgport, Connecticut, is the home of a suicide club and a good many people who are either unduly impressionable or lack a faculty somewhere. On the night the comet was to have made us a friendly call but didn't, the citizens of that place, or a good many of them, were in a state of "wild-eyed" trepidation; the mayor had made arrangements with the fire department on the police whereby the city was to be notified the instant the blazing wanderer came within close quarters—the fire bells were to strike three times at short intervals and the guardians of the peace were so disposed as to sound the alarm when it would do the most good, or harm, as the case might be. Along about 9 o'clock those whose nerves were on a painful tension obtained that relaxation which comes through reaching the climax. The alarm sounded! and brightly against the leaden clouds arose a subdued but well-defined glow! The comet had come, the end was at hand! People rushed out of their homes and with shouts of "There's the comet!" huddled tremblingly and in many cases despairingly together. The light gradually increased and men ran to the wharves, presumably to have water hoody when the collision came. One old woman jumped up and down in a half frenzied state, shouting, "I'm glad I sold my turkeys before Thanksgiving, because we won't live to see Christmas!" What an absurd condition for the greater part of a large community to be placed in, and how sheepishly they must all have felt when the glad tidings came that the illumination was caused by a fire in a neighboring town, the glow being thrown upon the overhanging clouds!

THE PINKERTONS.

We learn from the Denver News that T. C. Walker, a well known expressman of Leadville, has filed suit in the district court against the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad company and the Pinkerton Detective agency. The amount which he asks aggregates $41,500. Walker was arrested at the instance of the defendants last December for conspiracy, with John and Frank Price, to dispose of two gold retorts of the value of $700, alleged to be the property of the Denver and Rio Grande Express company. On a preliminary examination he was discharged, but was rearrested on the charge of robbing the United States mail, and was liberated after an incarceration of several days without a trial or hearing of any kind. He was again arrested and taken to Denver, tried in the United States circuit court and acquitted. His grounds for action are based upon two charges, malicious prosecution and false imprisonment.

No one who looks at these properly and understandingly will question the usefulness—in fact, the indispensable quality—of detective work now and then. There are special cases calling for the employment of an instinct adapted to analyzing, locating and ferreting in order that detection and, if necessary, punishment may follow. An officer with or without a warrant does not of necessity possess the requirements in a sufficient degree to enable him to work out intricate or difficult cases, and then the employment of a detective or a force of them may be essential; without such employment at such times, the welfare and maybe the life of an individual or the safety of a community would be jeopardized. There is a difference between such a condition of things and that we have of late become familiarized with as the result of employing Pinkerton; it does not mean the detection or prevention of crime so much as it once did, but often than can much longer be tolerated the commission of it. The Homestead affair was but the greatest of many such crimes committed upon an unjustifiable pretext, and the people, while sternly resenting it, will not be likely to let the perpetrators of another such escape without condign punishment.

Upon the opening of court yesterday morning Jones was arraigned and took the statutory time to plead.

PRESIDENT HARRISON'S MESSAGE.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 6. — President Harrison sent his annual message to Congress today. In opening, he says the country never in its history was in a more prosperous condition, and quotes numerous statistics to prove this fact, giving it as his opinion that the present unprecedented prosperity is traceable to the protective system which has prevailed for something like thirty years.

Continuing the President says, that it is not his purpose to renew the argument in favor of the protective tariff. The result of the recent election must be accepted as having introduced a new policy, which means the repeal of the present protective tariff.

TARIFF TALK.

The tariff bills passed by the House of Representatives at the last session were, as is supposed even in the opinion of the promoters, inadequate, and justified only by the fact that the Senate and House were not in accord, and a general revision could not be undertaken. The President recommends that the whole subject of tariff revision be left to the incoming Congress, a matter which he regrets, because the threat of great tariff changes introduces uncertainty and inaction in business circles, and will likely lead to a decrease in revenues from customs duties.

The United States in its history has had several experiences of the contrasted effects of a revenue and protective tariff, but this generation has not felt them, and the experience of one generation is not highly instructive to the next. The friends of the protective system with undiminished confidence in the principles they have advocated will wait the results of the new experiment and will be agreeably disappointed, if it proves a success.

The strained and too often disturbed relations existing between the employed and the employers of our great manufacturing establishments have not been favorable to a calm consideration by the wage earner and the effect upon wages of the protective system. He may now be able to review the question in the light of his personal experience under the operation of a tariff for revenue only.

The President commands

THE WORK OF THE ADMINISTRATION during the last fiscal year, and says that every effort has been made to benefit the public welfare. Our relations with other nations are now undisturbed by any serious controversy and since his last message, President Harrison says that reciprocal trade agreements have been consummated between the United States and the following foreign countries: Guatemala, Salvador, the German Empire, Great Britain, Nicaragua, Honduras and Austria-Hungary.

The reciprocal agreements have been of much value to the United States, as is shown by our great increase in the foreign trade. The Bering seal dispute is in a fair way for arbitration and a result substantially establishing our claims and preserving this great industry to all nations is expected.

RELATIVE TO CANADA.

Referring to our relations with

Canada President Harrison regrets that in many of our controversies with that country notably those as to the fisheries on the Atlantic, the sealing interests on the Pacific and the Welland canal tolls, the negotiations have continuously been thwarted by unreasonable and unfriendly protests and objections made by Canada.

Referring to the fact that the Canadian Pacific and other railway lines parallel our roads on the northern boundary, taking away from our companies an immense amount of business, the President says that advantages should be taken of our natural trade advantages and our independence asserted of the Canadian canals and the St. Lawrence as an outlet to the sea by the construction of an American canal around the falls of Niagara and the opening of ship communication between the great lakes and one of our own seaports.

AS TO MEXICO.

The recent disturbances of the public peace by lawless foreign marauders on the Mexican frontier have afforded this government an opportunity to testify its good will for Mexico and its earnest purpose to fulfill the obligations of international friendship by pursuing and dispersing the evil doers.

The work of relocating the boundary of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo westward from El Paso is progressing favorably. It is impossible to overestimate the value of the Niagara ship canal, and it is to be hoped that Congress will give it an impetus that will secure its early completion.

THE SILVER QUESTION.

In regard to the silver question, President Harrison says: "Congress has been already advised that the invitations of this government for the assembling of an international monetary conference to consider the question of an enlarged issue of silver, was accepted by the nations to which they were issued. The conference assembled at Brussels on November 22d, and has entered upon the consideration of this great question. I have not doubted, and have taken occasion to express that belief, as well in the invitations issued for this conference as in my public messages, that the free coinage of silver upon an agreed international ratio would greatly promote the interests of our people and equally those of other nations. It is too early to predict what results may be accomplished by the conference. If any temporary check or delay intervenes, I believe that very soon the commercial conditions will compel the now reluctant governments to unite with us in this movement to secure the enlargement of the volume of money needed for the transaction of the business of the world."

THE TREASURY.

Referring to the administration of the treasury department the President says: "If there are any who still think that the surplus should have been kept out of circulation by hoarding it in the treasury, or by depositing it in banks without interest, while the government continued to pay the very banks interest upon the bonds deposited as security for the deposits, or who think that the extended pension legislation was a public robbery, or that the duties upon sugar should have been maintained, I am content to leave the argument where it now rests while we wait to see whether these criticisms will take the form of legislation.

The public confidence in the purpose and ability of the government to maintain the parity of all our money issued whether gold or paper must remain unshaken. The demand for gold in Europe and the consequent call upon us are to a considerable degree the results of the effects of some of the European governments to increase their gold reserves and these efforts should be met by appropriations upon our part. The conditions that have created this drain on the treasury gold are in some degree political and not commercial. In view of the fact that a general revision of our revenue laws in the near future seems to be probable, it would be better that any changes should be a part of that revision, rather than of a temporary nature.

SILVER PURCHASES.

During the last fiscal year the secretary purchased under the act of July 14th, 1890, 54,335,748 ounces of silver and issued in payment therefor $1,108,608 in notes. The total purchases since the passage of the act have been 120,479,981 ounces, and the aggregate of notes issued $118,783,590. The average price paid for silver during the year was 94 cents per ounce, the highest price being $104 on July 1st, 1891, and the lowest 83, on March 21st, 1892. In view of the fact that the monetary conference is now sitting and that a conclusion, has as yet not been reached, I withhold any recommendation as to the legislation upon this subject.

REPORTS OF VARIOUS DEPARTMENTS.

The postmaster-general's report shows a most gratifying increase and a most efficient progressive management of the great business of that department.

The report of the secretary of the navy exhibits great progress in the construction of our new navy. When the present secretary entered upon his duties, only three modern steel vessels were in commission. The vessels since put in commission during the winter will make a total of nineteen during his administration of the department.

President Harrison says the court of private land claims established by Congress for the promotion of the policy of speedily settling contested land titles is making satisfactory progress in its work, and when the work is completed a great impetus will be given to the development of those regions where unsettled claims under Mexican grants have so long retarded their progressive influence. Add to these the Indian lands opened for settlement, and the amount of land opened to settlement during this administration reaches 28,000,000 acres.

Speaking of the pension department the President declares himself satisfied, that the affairs of this office have been honestly and effectively administered. The list has greatly increased and the deficiency for the fiscal year is $10,058,612. The maximum expenditure for the year ending June 1894 will be $188,000,000.

He recommends that a commission be appointed to determine the best means of settling the claim of the government against the Union Pacific.

EXPORTS.

The export of American produce has greatly increased. Dressed beef has increased from 17,001,001 pounds in 1890 to 23,500,000 pounds in 1891, and during the past year 391,637 head of cattle have been exported against 28,786 in 1889, while the department of agriculture has done much to extirpate the disease of pleuro-pneumonia.

The agriculture constituted 71.1 per cent. of our exports in the year ending June 30, 1892, the amount reaching $789,117,676, the total exports being $1,070,357,080.

The President approves the twenty days' quarantine of all immigrant vessels and will continue the order indefinitely. He advocates the most stringent quarantine regulations to protect the country against the cholera plague liable to break out next year.

THE WORLD'S FAIR.

But brief mention is made of the Columbian exposition, and that simply congratulating the country upon the magnificent exposition, which will be the greatest ever held on the globe.

He advocates the passage of a law to protect railroad employees against danger of accident in braking and coupling freight cars. He deplores the evils connected with the

as related to the choice of national officers, and the unfair apportionment of Congressional districts, and calls upon Congress to appoint a non-partisan commission to investigate the evils and pass laws which will abolish them.

He denounces the lynching of the colored people in the South and says the matter should be subject for legislation.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

This exhibit of the work of the executive department is submitted to Congress and to the public, in the hope that there will be found in it a due sense of the responsibility and earnest purpose to maintain the national honor and to promote the happiness and prosperity of all our people. And this brief exhibit of the growth and prosperity of the country will give us a level from which to note the increase or decrease of that new legislative policies may bring to us.

There is no reason why the national influence, power and prosperity should not observe the rates of increase that have characterized the past thirty years. We carry the great impulse and increase of these years into the future. There is no reason why in many lines of production we should not surpass all other nations, as we have already done in some. There are no near frontiers to our possible developments. Retrogression would be a crime.

GRAND COUNTY ELECTION.

MOAB, Grand Co., Utah, Dec. 5, 1892.—I thought I would let you know what I have produced this year and what I have done, and then if you can tell what my hobby is I will be much obliged. In the first place I will give you the amount of land I cultivate: 74 acres. The amount of fruit shipped by railroads is as follows: 1340 crates of peaches, average $1 per crate; 120 bushel-crates of apples, $2.50 per crate; 20 crates of pears, $3 per crate; 25 crates of plums, $1 per crate; 25 crates of apricots, at 75c per crate; 80 crates of grapes, at 75c per crate.

Besides this, I hauled three wagon loads to Rico, Colo., made 1000 gallons of wine, and have 300 bushels of apples on hand; I have raised 75 bushels of barley, 125 of wheat, 185 of oats, 40 of corn, 75 of peas, 200 of potatoes and 6400 pounds of pumkin seed. I have 75 tons of hay, have a threshing machine which I run, have spent two weeks working on a mill dam, have made one trip to Leadville, Colorado, three to Aspen, Colorado, and called at Glenwood Springs; have been four times to Grand Junction, Colorado, and made three trips to Rico, Colorado. I have taken out 5000 pounds of honey; have a few head of horses and cattle, and have branded thirteen calves and eight colts.

Now, Mr. Editor, your comment on my first letter would convey the idea that I thought of nothing but fruit. I presume I think of more things in a day than the average of men. Still I am proud to say I understand how to produce large and fine fruits, and as soon as I have time will tell your readers something about it.

We have had a terrible plague visiting our place lately and most of our people partook of it. It came in a spring wagon with two horses hitched to it and two men in it. The latter called at the houses when the men were away. They were very genteel, would walk in and ask the privilege of showing some goods, and would take in the situation. They would throw out a few dress patterns, a shawl, a table cover, and would then say: "Now, madam, there is $17.00 worth. The prices are fixed by the receiver, and the goods must be sold. Now, I will throw in this and this"—whereupon they would throw in a few towels and handkerchiefs. All the time they were making the sale they would find out the circumstances of the man of the house and the neighbors. If everything was favorable they would call again when the men were at home. They would open a package, would commence covering the place with genteel goods and a few of ladies' wear. Then they began: "Now, mister, these goods are in the receiver's hands and have to be sold and the price is fixed. I can not change the price, but you can have these goods for $90 and I will throw in this and this"—exactly as before, and if the parties hesitated they would empty their valise and even make several trips to their wagon for more goods. Then they would throw down a $5 bill or coin, in some cases they would even throw down $20. They do not want a bent in cash, but will take the buyers' note from a month to a year without interest, and they invariably made a sale where they could get into the house. A neighbor of mine was sharp enough not to let them within his door; they told him they were going to sell him a bundle before they left; but the third time they called he told them if they came again they would have him to whip. They took him at his word and stayed away. At Bluff a good Danish brother told them he was busy and they could not sell him a thing he had heard of them. "Well," said they, "there is no harm in just going in the house to look at the goods." Before they left they sold him two big bundles. As a rule, they come down in their prices to $70, and how much of this represents clear gain to them you can judge for yourself.

This plague is traveling west intending to take in Utah. Our experience may suffice to put the people on their guard.

O. W. WARNER.

MEXICAN MISSION CONFERENCE.

This conference was held November 26th and 27th, 1892. President Teasdale, Counselors A. F. Macdonald and Henry Eyering, Patriarch Henry Lunt, Bishops Geo. W. Sevy, W. D. Johnson, Jr., and Jesse N. Smith, Jr., members of the High Council and other leading Elders occupied the platform in the Juarez school house.

After the usual exercises President Teasdale welcomed all who were in attendance and said the Saints in this mission are gaining a very valuable experience; though the season has been dry and water scarce the Lord has nevertheless blessed us with good crops. The speaker delivered an interesting discourse on home industries, encouraging the Saints to strive as far as possible to produce what they need for food and raiment, and that if they will do so and ask the blessings of the Lord upon their labors they will be abundantly blessed in their efforts.

Bishops W. D. Johnson, Jr., G. W. Sevy and Jesse N. Smith, Jr., dwelt upon the same subject and reported their wards as being in a prosperous condition.

2 p. m.—Elder George Lake, Counselor H. Eyering and Patriarch Henry Lunt spoke on home industries, education of our children, caring for the poor, and their past experience in the Church.

Sunday morning, at 10 o'clock, the Sunday Schools held their conference and had an interesting and instructive time, with a large attendance.

2 p. m.—Counselor A. F. Macdonald delivered an excellent discourse on the benefit of temples and the redemption of our dead.

President Teasdale presented the general authorities of the Church, also the presiding officers of the mission and the Church school board, W. D. Johnson, Jr., being set apart as mission superintendent of schools.

President Teasdale encouraged the Saints to be kind to the poor, to minister to their necessities and to let none suffer, instructed the Relief societies as to their duties in regard to the needy and encouraged all to faithfulness.

7 p. m.—Elder Heleman Pratt, Bishop W. D. Johnson, Jr., Elders Miles P. Romney, Franklin Spencer, P. H. Hearst, D. E. Harris and W. R. R. Stowell spoke in regard to the future of the mission, home industries, education of the youth, the necessity of setting good examples and of their own personal experience in the ministry.

The spirit prevailing was edifying, instructive and comforting, and the general expression was, this is the best conference we have ever had in Mexico.

The choir, with John J. Walseer leader, rendered beautiful music that cheered the hearts of all present, and their rapid improvement under his able leadership is remarkable.

All the societies and organizations held their annual conference, and a more brotherly feeling probably does not exist than does in this remote, isolated stake of Zion, who have for long months looked forward to the promised visit of some of the leading Elders of the Church from Utah, but who are thankful they are permitted to have an Apostle ministering among them.

MILES P. ROMNEY, Mission Clerk.

COLONIA JUAREZ, Nov. 28, 1892.

OGDEN ITEMS.

On account of the wrecks the south-bound passenger train which should have reached here at 5:05 last evening, was delayed six hours.

Judge H. W. Smith has been retained by the Democrats of Oneida county, Idaho, and will contest the election of Sheriff-elect John L. Thomas on the ground that the latter is not a naturalized citizen.

The board of directors of the Agricultural college has elected Samuel Fortier, former engineer of the Bear River canal and Ogden City waterworks system, to the chair of civil and hydraulic engineering.

The Idaho Falls yards were the scene of another wreck at about the same hour as the fatal smashup occurred. A freight train flew the track and a number of cars were derailed. No one was hurt.

The hearing in the damage suit of Emanuel Swineart vs. Union Pacific, concluded in Judge Miner's court. After being out a little over two hours the jury returned a verdict of $7000 for the plaintiff. The case will be appealed. Damages to the tune of $25,000 were claimed.

Early yesterday morning burglars entered the cellar door of the store of Smolin & Thomas. After prying off a padlock which barred the way, and opening the safe which had negligently been left unlocked, they took $15, leaving a large amount of small change and several endorsed checks.

Messrs. Spratlin and Cleog, representing the Afro-American bureau of information, were in Ogden yesterday. The gentlemen are looking over the west in search of suitable locations for the negroes of the Southern states who desire to remove from their present homes. They are much pleased with Utah and Ogden.

The Plymouth Rock Building, Loan and Savings association held its annual meeting yesterday. Forty-two of its members are securing homes of their own through its aid. Members are paying dues at the present time on $34,000. The association has disposed of $200,000 worth of stock. Investments in stock are paying 18 per cent net.

At the city council meeting last evening the most important business was the authorization of a ten-days' advertisement for bids for the sale of $50,000 5 per cent twenty year improvement bonds, and the acceptance of sewer district No. 6. Recorder Bryan submitted his quarterly report of the city's finances, showing the total receipts to have been $41,216.70, and disbursements $54,826.06.

Yesterday morning about 2 o'clock freight train on the Utah and Northern, when near Pocatello, Idaho, struck a bull and went into the ditch. The engine, tender and five cars piled up into an indescribable mass, and from the ruins the engineer and fireman, William D. Rham, were extricated, the former unhurt, but the latter was so terribly injured that he died yesterday afternoon in the hospital at Pocatello, where he had been removed.

Deputy United States Marshal Gregg of Portland, has arrived in Ogden, having in charge J. P. Jones, the laundryman, who has been indicted on the charge of adultery, said to have been committed early in the year with Mrs. Minnie Trabing, a former resident of Ogden and a wealthy widow. Jones was arrested at Portland by the officers there, by authority of a bench warrant issued two weeks ago by Judge Miner. He has a family here.

Yesterday morning it was rumored in court circles that Mr. C. H. McClure, who has been clerk of the Fourth district court since August 20th, 1890, had resigned his position. When Mr. McClure was seen yesterday afternoon he confirmed the truth of the report, and said that his resignation had been in the hands of Judge Miner since November 20 last. The matter became public only yesterday morning, and caused a decided sensation among the members of the bar, who were all greatly surprised at the news. Immediately a number of gentlemen started to get the position. On January 10th Mr. McClure will start for California, where he will spend a month of business. Returning the matter of his future plans will be taken into consideration.

PROVO LETTER.

PROVO, Dec. 6.—The county court held a session yesterday. Petitions for support were received from Thomas Bean and Esther Parker, indigent persons. The matter was referred to Selectman Holdaway. A communication was received from the U. S. marshal, giving notice that the district court would vacate the court house about February 1st, 1893, as the new apartments would be ready by that time. Communication filed. A report was received from the bee inspector concerning the examination and cleansing of several stands of bees in Benjamin, Payson and Springville. The coroner reported several inquests held by him. The reports were accepted.

The G. A. R. society of this city have elected the following officers for the year 1893: Commander, M. J. Barrett; senior vice-commander, W. H. Berry; junior vice-commander, J. M. Westwood; officer of the day, George E. Alger; surgeon, James Williams; chaplain, W. J. Bonham; guard master, J. B. Pemberton; officer of the guard, Benton Cole.

Cram, the laundryman, and Perry, the blacksmith, have sworn out complaints of assault against each other. Cram charges Perry with striking at him with a shovel, and Perry charges Cram with drawing a gun on him. The cases will be heard before Justice Gash today.

The funeral services over the remains of Ida Leona, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Kenner, of Ogden, will be held today. The child died at Ogden, but was brought to this city for interment.

Two young ladies have arrived in this city; one of them blesses the home of Bishop Gibbey and the other the home of Frank Knight. In each case "the first," and all rejoice accordingly.

William H. King is around again after his serious illness.

Judge Saxey is reported to be very ill.

The City Council held a session last night.

The Salt Lake Herald asked that $200 be appropriated for advertising in the Herald World's Fair edition. Referred to the committee on finance.

The recorder reported that he had collected $1,248 in licenses during November.

The committee on waterworks reported that at the contract and bond of Rhodes Brothers had been examined. Rhodes Brothers could not be required to keep in repair the system of waterworks more than one year, but they could be required to more effectually band the wooden pipe portion of the waterworks. The committee understood that Rhodes Brothers were shipping a quantity of rods for the purpose of complying with this requirement; but to be safe, the committee recommended that Rhodes Brothers be notified of their failure, up to the present time, in filling their contract in this particular; and the attorney was instructed to notify Rhodes Brothers in accordance therewith.

The city attorney reported in relation to the suit brought against the city by Samuel Cluff for damages sustained through defects in the water system, that if the city were liable, Rhodes Brothers would be liable to the city and should be so notified. The attorney was instructed to notify them.

SNOWFLAKE, Nov. 30, 1892.

SAN JUAN.

The quarterly conference of this Stake of Zion was held on Saturday and Sunday November 19th and 20th, at Mancos, Colorado. Besides the Presidency of the Stake and a good representation of the High Counselors and Bishops and counsel of the various wards, Apostle Franklin D. Richards was present. The reports of the Bishops showed that the Saints were generally pressing forward and desirous of performing their duties. The instructions given were such as to encourage the Saints, and especially those called to labor in the Priesthood, to the faithful performance of their duties.

Apostle Richards dwelt especially on the subject of Temple building, and the importance of the Saints awakening to a realization of the work of redeeming their dead who have died without a knowledge of the Gospel.

The general and local authorities were sustained and the following brethren were selected and sustained by the conference as missionaries: Henry Holyoak of Moab ward, and John H. Hammond of Manassas ward, to go to England; Louis B. Burnham of Burnham ward, to the Pacific Islands; Charles E. Walton of Monticello ward, and Hanson J. Nielson, to fields not yet designated.

The High Council of the Stake were fully organized and set in working order. The Relief Societies, Y. L. M. I. A. and Primary associations held their respective conferences which were attended by the Saints generally. This has been one of the best attended conferences ever held in this Stake.

It is clean coal, and it is the intention of these miners to supply the local market at $2 per ton. They are already delivering coal in town at this price, but the developments they have made, do not yet justify them in soliciting orders. When the train left Grant it had 9000 sheep, 1000 of which belong to a man at Friend, and 1000 to Mr. Beyersdorf of Nebraska City cereal mills. Halley Times—The roasting furnace, the batteries and other parts of the Vienna Mining company's mill, at Red Wing, are idle, and the pans will doubtless be stopped for the winter in a day or two. The mill run just made has demonstrated that the ore could be worked up to quite a high percentage, but the price of silver is so low that the financial results are anything but satisfactory, notwithstanding the high grade of the ore. Most of the men employed at the Solace mine and at the Vienna mill have therefore been laid off, only a small force being retained to drive a 1300-foot tunnel on contract. If the outlook next spring justifies it, the mill will be started up as early as possible, and a large force employed, both at the mine and in the mill.

Kenneth McKenzie, pilot on an electric street car at Great Falls, Montana, has been killed while in the discharge of his duty at that place. His was the last car to town from Boston and Great Falls addition on the Central avenue line, and when it reached the switch at Ninth street it was going at such a rapid rate that it jumped the track, McKenzie was thrown over the front and dragged along between the car and ground for over 100 feet. When his body was taken out he was mangled almost beyond recognition. Both legs were crushed and the brains oozed from a frightful cut on the skull, and part of the entrails protruded from a wound in the abdomen. The life must have been fairly crushed out of the unfortunate man the instant he fell in front of the car. The other four occupant of the car was John Laron, the conductor who escaped with a few bruises. The coroner's inquest exonerated the company from blame.

EDISON is wrong in his theory that bald-headed men are not long lived, says an exchange. Any person who has seen the pictures of Father Time can bear witness that he's as bald as a base ball with the exception of that forelock which the most people find so hard to grasp, and it should be borne in mind that there is no reported case of a bald-headed man having died of consumption.

A FIGHT WITH A PANTHER.

When I was nine years old, about 48 years ago, my father one morning took me with him to cut a tree. It was four miles out on the mountain. We had what we called palls in that country, made out of cedar with a handle on one side to lift it by. He got one of them, a butcher knife and his ax and thus equipped we went. When we came to about twenty-five yards from the tree my father sat the palls down with the knife in it and told me to look around for bees. I did so and soon found them in a white oak tree. He was in the act of felling the tree when he was startled by a noise coming from the mountain. Shortly after, a panther was seen coming down the gulch, not more than 150 yards from us. The animal came along at a rapid gait and seemed to be in fury, its hair all turning the wrong way. My father armed himself with some rocks about as big as a man's fist and took a favorable position in which to await further developments. When the panther came opposite to where we stood, he flung a rock at the beast, but missed. A second effort was made with the same result. A third missile struck the animal and with a bound it came up to us. My father had barely time to snatch his ax. With this weapon he aimed a terrific blow at the infuriated beast. The ax went over the panther's back and rolled down the hill, and now commenced a fearful struggle.

The two combatants rolled over one another on the ground. My father could not reach his pocket knife, because he had to constantly guard himself against the awful teeth and claws. At last he ran his hand into the mouth of the beast and grabbing it by the under jaw, whirled it to the ground. At this juncture I brought the knife from the palls as quick as I could. My father then jumped astride of the beast and struck it five times with his knife behind the shoulders. The last time he held the knife in the wound. The panther kept up the fight, till he sank down dead. My father thought that the fight must have lasted about five minutes. My father's clothes were nearly all torn off, and the blood was running in a stream from each one of his hauds. He walked about fifty yards and then lay down and rested a minute, after which he again got up and went about the same distance. Then he had to lay down again. He groaned and bled profusely. I feared that he was going to die, but he encouraged me all the while. We had four miles to walk, but the wounded man succeeded in making the distance at last. He was laid up for two months. One arm had eight wounds above the elbow and the other had seven below the elbow. The affair became widely known as it was published in the papers at the time. I have traveled some in my time and I have seen some ugly things and some ugly fights, but I have never seen anything that looked as ugly and as desperate as that panther fight.

CAPTURING A KITTEN.

One bright day in May, when I was about 13 years old and my brother Charley was a year older, we started out together to visit the children on a farm about four miles distant. Charley walked, his gun on his shoulder, and I rode our old white horse, Bob.

I did little more than keep—pace—with my brother. I had been his companion ever since he had been allowed to have a gun. I had gone with him on his hunting expeditions to carry the game, and the old horse was often with us on our wanderings through the woods.

We lived on a large farm high up among the mountains of the coast range of California. The country was very sparsely settled and a visit to a neighbor meant a jaunt of several miles. I had learned to shoot well, but as we had but one gun and Charley was a boy, he usually claimed the right to the gun when we went hunting.

The mountains were full of deer, wildcats, and "coons." California lions and panthers were occasionally seen, to say nothing of rabbits, quail, and such small game.

On this day we left the house at about 9 o'clock. We trudged and jogged pleasantly along, but Charley did not kill even a squirrel and I took pains to tease him about his bad luck.

We spent the day with our young friends and started on our return at about 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

After we had left the main road and taken the trail toward home, Charley turned off into the woods to try to redeem his reputation as a hunter. I might have followed him, but I was in haste to get home. So I touched up old Bob with my whip, and jogged along down the lonely bridle-path.

Just as I was following a bend in the road, a mile and a half beyond the place where Charley and I had parted, something attracted my attention in what appeared to be a pile of leaves bedded in the hollow roots of a great oak. The object appeared to shine.

I turned my horse toward it to get a closer view and then discovered that the shining came from the bright eyes of several beautiful little creatures, which I at first took to be large kittens; but when I dismounted I found that they were the cubs of a mountain lion!

I was delighted. I had always had a fondness for kittens and these little animals were much prettier than any kitten. They were plump and most beautifully marked. They got up and began to gambol and play with each other in the most innocent and engaging manner.

What ideal pets! Instantly the thought came to me, "why not capture them and take them home?" Here would be glory for me, to be sure. How I would triumph over Charley!

I stooped over and picked up two of them; there were four in all.

I had much difficulty in mounting my horse with the baby lions in my arms for they wriggled and scratched and did everything in their power to prevent me from carrying them off; but at last I was in the saddle and started off. Fortunately my horse knew the road and was perfectly safe, so I merely threw the bridle over my arm and held a crying kitten in each hand.

How they did meow and squall! First one and then the other, and then a duet!

All at once in the midst of all this yelling of the cubs the thought flashed across my mind that the mother would probably come home, and finding two of her babies gone go in quest of them; and here I was, creeping along on a slow old horse, three miles from home, with two young lions. It was about time to wake up old Bob!

I looked for my whip. It was gone. Probably I had dropped it in my attempts to mount.

Here was a new difficulty. It was impossible for me to get off and on again with the big kittens in my arms, and the old horse would trot along for only a few steps, and then subside into his usual slow walk. It was only by dint of hard kicking and fierce jerking of the bridle that I contrived to get him into an occasional fair trot.

We had gone about a mile farther, and I was culling one of my kittens into submission, when I heard what I fancied was a growl behind me.

I turned, but could see nothing. Nevertheless, I felt a little nervous, and kicked my feet against the horse's sides more vigorously than ever.

We went on about two rods, when I heard the same noise again. This time I thought I could not be mistaken, and I was not. Turning, I saw to my horror that a large California lioness was coming at a dead run not a 100 yards behind me.

Every few steps she uttered a horrid growl, and she looked really fiendish. My heart stood still, but I did not give up. Old Bob, too, heard the noise and increased his speed to the best pace he had.

Of course the little lions had caught the sound. They meowed and cried louder than ever. This excited the mother the more, and she redoubled her growls.

I dared not look around, but very soon it was not necessary for me to turn in order to see her. She was right by my side, and glaring at me in the most frightful manner.

There was nothing else to do; I took one of the kittens and threw it at the mother lion, and I threw it very hard, hitting her full in the face.

I fully believed that the old lioness would keep on and compel me to give up the other young one also, and I was astonished to see her seize this one in her mouth and make off as fast as possible toward her lair.

This was very pleasing, but I was perfectly certain that the old lioness would come back after the remaining one. And unless I could get home, which was not probable, or should meet some one who had a gun, which was not probable, either, she would get it away from me.

I shouted louder still at old Bob, and almost stood up in the saddle in my excitement; but the poor old horse was already going about as fast as he could go. He seemed to appreciate the emergency, but he was getting badly winded.

We went on about three-quarters of a mile more. It occurred to me that I might keep the kitten from continually announcing our whereabouts to its mother, so I propped its mouth wide open with my fingers, and this stopped its crying.

We were making pretty good time and I was beginning to feel a little reassured when I heard the leaves cracking behind me. I knew what was coming and did not look around. I kept on, determined to hold the kitten at all hazards.

Very soon, however, I heard the old lioness much closer than I had expected and turned around just at the moment that my horse made a violent plunge forward. The lioness had dug her forefeet into the horse's thighs, preparatory to leaping upon his back.

With a terrified scream, I flung the kitten away with all my might. The lioness released her hold on the horse, and, taking this kitten in her mouth as she had taken the other, uttered a growl, and with a savage glare at me, disappeared in the thick underbrush.

Trembling with fright, and choked with indignation to think that after all my efforts I could not keep even one of the pretty little creatures, I continued my ride home.

I reached the gate soon, and in a few moments related my adventure at the supper table. Before I had finished Charley burst into the room, holding aloft a young lion!

My heart bounded. He had captured my kitten! In great excitement he began to tell his story. He was just returning to the trail from his hunt in the woods when he met face to face the mountain lioness bearing her young one in her mouth. Both were very much startled, lioness and boy; but Charlie recovered his presence of mind first and raising his gun fired, killing the she-lion instantly.

He then picked up the little one, and also succeeded in dragging the mother a short distance. He left her just at the edge of the woods and ran home with the living cub to get help.

Charley magnanimously gave me the baby. Of course I was a little crestfallen, feeling that I had lost my share of the glory, but I was commended and complimented after all.

I kept the little lion three years. We fed him on bread and milk, and as he grew he showed no signs of his wild nature. He played amicably with the dog, and was on good terms with all the family.

One day, however, I unfastened his chain to give him exercise, and one of the first things he did was to kill a chicken. It was his first taste of blood. After that he committed some depredation whenever he was let loose. He grew sullen and morose.

At last he bit a little girl who came to visit us, drawing blood, which he lapped eagerly. She was alone with him; and when we heard her cry and ran out we found that the cub had thrown the child down, and was resting his paws on her body.

He was killed at once. I felt a few severe pangs at his death, but we saved the skin. Charley had already tanned the skin of the mother. We had the cub's skin treated in the same way; and now, when my mother tells the story of our youthful experience, as she often does, she points proudly to the two beautiful robes—the spoils of her children's lion hunt.—Beatrice Rodriguez Moses in the Youth's Companion.

DEATH OF E. PIERSON.

Ebenezer Lester Pierson, one of the members of the Mormon battalion, died at the house of his nephew Parley L. Pierson, at North Plymouth, Box Elder county, Utah, November 10th, 1892, the cause being dropsy of the chest.

The deceased was a son of Daniel Pierson and Julian Lester, and was born in the State of Connecticut, Oct. 28, 1828. He joined the Church about 1841, in his native state, and soon afterwards repaired to the headquarters of the Church at Nauvoo, Illinois, from where he was driven in the general exodus of the Saints in 1846 into the western wilds. Having arrived at a point on the Missouri river, when the call for the Mormon battalion was made, he entered at once, and marched as a private in company A to California, where he was finally discharged in 1847. After working in the mines for some time he came to Utah in 1848, and has been a resident of this Territory ever since. In 1851 he located at Fillmore, Millard county, being one of the first settlers of that place, and after residing there for twenty years he removed to Willard, Box Elder county. About two years ago he went to live with his nephew in the Plymouth ward, where he remained till the time of his death. He was never married.

RESOLUTIONS TO J. H. PAXMAN.

The following resolutions of respect to the memory of Joseph Hyrum Paxman, who died at Nephi on November 25th, have been received at this office with a request to publish:

Whereas, The almighty God whom we all reverence has seen in His mercy to take to Himself our esteemed and beloved brother, Joseph Hyrum Paxman who, at the age of twenty-three, has gained the love of all who knew him, and who was kind, loving, humble, charitable, long-suffering, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Nephi Sunday School of which he was a faithful officer, acknowledge God in all things, do mourn and tender our deepest sympathy to the bereaved parents and members of the family with our earnest prayer that God, who doeth all things well, will impart His blessings upon them. We also say:

There is no death, but angels form
Walk o'er the earth with silent tread;
They bear our best-loved things away,
And then we call them dead.

Resolved, That we acknowledge his high worth as a laborer in the Sunday School, and that we have lost a jewel, as have the Young Men's Mutual Improvement Association, the Seventy-first quorum of Seventies, and the community in which he moved. We say to all, emulate his example. What is our loss is his gain.

But ever near us, though unseen,
The dear immortal spirits tread:
For all the boundless universe
Is life—there are no dead.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be presented to the parents; that they be entered upon the record of the Nephi Sunday school, and that the Nephi Courier and DESERET EVENING NEWS be asked to publish the same.

THE RESTORED LANDS ARE INCLUDED IN A small strip lying alongside the southern boundary.

A LAND DECISION.

Assistant Secretary Chandler of the General Land Office has rendered a decision in the case of John Barlow vs. Commissioners of University Lands of Utah Territory, on appeal of commissioners from the decision of the office, holding for cancellation their selection of a tract of Salt Lake City land district and allowing Barlow to offer final homestead proof therefor. The decision modifies so as to notify the commissioners when Barlow offers proof and that they be allowed to protest the same and be heard on the question of priority, taking the supplemental list as marking the date when university rights would attach. The case dates back from 1877 when the university commissioners selected an eighty-acre tract of land near Richfield. John Barlow claimed to be an actual settler at that time under the homestead act. The property was held for cancellation by reason of Barlow's improvement of said residence on the land by the commissioner of the general land office under date of Nov. 20, 1891. The university commissioners appealed from this and the decision noted above is upon this point.

DEATH ROBERT PARRY.

Robert Parry died on November 8th, 1892, in the town of Ludlow, England, in his eighty-ninth year.

In the later years of his life the British government gave him a pension of £100 annually in recognition of his valuable services as lecturer to the working classes in the interest of economy.

In the year 1854 he joined the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and traveled as an Elder under Daniel Jones in the Welsh mission, and was held in great respect by the Saints.

He had considerable talent as a poet, many of his productions being still extant and possessed of more than usual merit.

In the year 1842-43 he visited the United States.

He was born in Gaerarfon, North Wales. [Translated from Y. Drych.]

RELIGIOUS.

Sunday Services.

Religious services were held at the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Sunday, December 4th, 1892, commencing at 2 o'clock p. m., President Angus M. Cannon presiding.

The choir sang the hymn beginning:

Though deepening trials throng your way,
Press on, press on, ye Saints of God.

Prayer was offered by Patriarch Alexander Hill.

The choir and congregation sang the hymn:

Redeemer of Israel,
Our only delight.

The Priesthood of the Eighteenth ward officiated in the administration of the Sacrament.

PRESIDENT GEORGE Q. CANNON

was the speaker. He read a portion of the tenth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles—from the 25th to the last verse—and pointed out the great importance of mankind having a correct idea of the God whom they worship. The Latter-day Saints, he remarked, were greatly favored in that they were not alone dependent upon the Bible for their guidance, but had, in addition, those two records which they also held soored, the Book of Mormon and the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, which contained the pure word of God by revelation to His servants in these last days. These records corroborated and strengthened the Bible—all joining together to illustrate the character of God and His dealings with the children of men. President Cannon's remarks occupied an hour and twenty minutes in delivery, and therefore a synopsis would not do justice to the discourse.

The choir sang the anthem:

Let the mountains shout for joy.

The congregation then joined with the choir in singing the doxology; and The benediction was pronounced by Counselor Charles W. Penrose.

It is perhaps just as well to advise the (prospective?) Hon. Mrs. Lease that while there is generally no limit as to the time a senator may occupy so long as he (or she) speaks to the question, neither is there any rule requiring other senators or the audience to remain and listen to the speech; that, in fact, it can be printed in the Congressional Record without delivery.

EX-SPEAKER REED recently engaged to lecture in Western New York on the "Progress of Humanity," but when the first night came the audience was so small that nothing was done. This prompts the Boston Herald to remark that it was because he was not permitted to preside, in which case he would have "counted a quorum" anyway.

By One of the Sex.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

Some mothers are asking for particular information about the stories I suggested as the amusement and instruction of childish minds. A good way to begin is to tell first the story of Adam and Eve, and so on down to the reign of King Zedekiah; then take up the Book of Mormon and go on with that down to the Book of Nephi. Take up the Testament next and the stories of the life of the Savior; then after His crucifixion come back to this continent and finish the Book of Mormon. From there come down to the Prophet Joseph and in easy stories tell the history of the Church. I know a little boy, quite a little fellow, who has heard many stories, but his favorite one is of the experience of the youthful Prophet Joseph and his first vision. The child has seen President Joseph F. Smith, and in some vague but firm way he has fastened the story to the living Prophet, and so he persistently asks and believes the whole story to be "the story of the Prophet Joseph F."

We will take up these stories and see what can be made of them. If you are talking to many children, watch each pair of eyes; see the effect of your talk, and learn how to best proceed. Never let the attention of your listener wander for a moment. Do not accomplish by force, else you are undoing all your good work; but the key note for your labors is to excite interest, interest the child, interest yourself.

Let us begin with the story of

ADAM AND EVE:

Once upon a time—now isn't that a delightful beginning, dear children, for you know all the very nicest stories begin "once upon a time?" Well, then, once upon a time; and do you know it was really and truly the first time on this great, big earth. There didn't anybody live here on this earth, and shall I tell you why? Well, our dear Heavenly Father and our dear Heavenly Mother had a large and beautiful family of spirits away up there in Heaven, and they wanted a place where those spirits could go and get bodies—just like your bodies and mine. You know, dears, these bodies would die if our spirits were out of them. See my arm move; look at mamma wink her eyes, and hear mamma's voice; that's the spirit in me that makes me do that. Well, now, our Heavenly Parents thought they'd come down from heaven and make a big, beautiful earth as a home for their spirit children.

(The story of the creation can be told, if the children are old enough to understand and appreciate it, that is, if they will be interested in it.)

So they came down, and found a lot of materials in space and fashioned this earth. And there were, oh! such beautiful flowers and trees and singing birds and great big beasts! can't you tell me some names of them? Yes, there were roses and lillies, and apple trees and orange trees; and sparrows and nightingales and meadow-larks, and horses and dogs and lions. All those were here, and there wasn't a man or a woman anywhere on the earth. And so our Father wanted a lovely garden in a place called Eden and then He brought a man and a woman down and put them here in this beautiful garden.

The Education of Our Young People.

There is a wide and constantly growing interest manifested by our communities in the school and the educational training of our youth. This must be pleasing to God, to the angels and to the prophets dead and living who have taught and always teach the truth that everything learned here is that much capital with which to begin the life eternal. But some errors of judgment which characterize our actions in this regard can well receive some thought and attention. There are parents who attempt to settle the destiny of their children. They want Thomas to be a doctor, when nature designed him to be a good carpenter and joiner, and while the carpentering might have been done by Thomas in a good and workmanlike manner, the doctoring will certainly be a blotch. It is the same with a girl. Many a mother scrimp and saves to give her daughter the lessons in music which she fondly hopes will make the girl a first-class musician, when the girl has no talent at all for the divine art. To be sure, there is such a thing as implanting traits and gifts more or less strongly upon succeeding generations by centuries of cultivation, but is it worth the while? The lily is no less beautiful because it is utterly unlike the rose, and the song of the nightingale could never be learnt by the parrot, no matter how assiduously he might be trained. As sensible parents, it behoves us to study the dispositions of our children closely and seek to develop the natural talents and gifts implanted in the nature by the Divine Parents before the individual had ever an existence upon earth, not forgetting to instill love and reverence for all the arts and sciences as a whole. If we have got a musician or a writer, don't try to compel him to become a sadler or a housemaid; let the talents we have brought with us from eternity have a chance to blossom out and bear fruit for our eternal glory.

A New Club of Women.

Thirty ladies of Salt Lake City have been invited to join a literary club, and are already organized and in full running order. The name of this club is the appropriate one of the "Gleaners," and they are busily thrusting their scythes into the field of knowledge and history. A subject interesting and timely is written upon by one member of the club, and afterwards the whole club takes up this same topic for discussion and adds such bits of information as may have been chosen through the week. After the chosen subject, a spirited and free discussion is held upon the current topics of the day. No recreation could be more delightful to those who have the privilege of attending. When such names as Mrs. Zina D. Young, Mrs. E. B. Wells, Mrs. M. I. Horne, Mrs. F. S. Taylor, Mrs. Mattie Paul Hughes, Mrs. Lillie Freeze, Mrs. M. Y. Dougall, Mrs. P. Y. Beattie, and other of the best known names in Utah are mentioned as members of the club, something of the wide scope and deep purposes of the organization can be surmised. It is whispered among some, however, that the exclusiveness of the club has the least tincture of selfishness about it, for thirty is the limit of members, and that has been reached. A number of good souls are wishing they had been chosen as part of the privileged few. Great benefit might be felt in all our settlements if such a movement could in some way be inaugurated as a part of or an adjunct to the Relief Society. Very far-reaching would be the good effects of a movement in this direction. Let us have a weekly literary meeting of the members of the Relief Society.

Woman's Club of Provo

In addition to the literary societies and clubs in Provo City, there exists a club which has no special feature of woman's interest to further, but deals with the whole subject of woman's development. Lectures on anatomy, physiology, and hygiene alternate with papers on club life, suffrage, household topics, dress, and the care of children. The club have fine rooms, prettily furnished, in Union Block, and there they meet twice a week—on Tuesdays to discuss and hear papers and lectures, and on Fridays to avail themselves of the efficient teachings of the young Harvard disciple of physical culture, Miss M. M. Babcock. The ladies are very enthusiastic in their work, and much good is being done.

As a very old-fashioned person, I have sometimes wondered if all these good things and topics could not in some way be incorporated and made a part of our Relief Society and Young Ladies' Associations. Why not?

Mrs. Blaine's Clever Pen.

To be one of Mrs. Blaine's correspondents is the desire of all who know her, writes Frank Woodberry in the December Ladies' Home Journal. Her letters are remarkable for their beauty of expression, cleverness and originality. Not the least of her accomplishments with the pen is her rare facility of expression through the medium of telegraph blanks. Her despatches of condolence or congratulations are unusual examples of brevity and meaning.

An Evening Musicales

In giving a successful evening musicale there are almost as many things to be avoided as there are to be accomplished, and it would seem almost that it might be wise to voice the suggestions which it is purposed to give here in the negative form, writes Mrs. Hamilton Mott in an exhaustive paper telling how to conduct one of these popular affairs, in the December Ladies' Home Journal. There are, in any case, a few important, if general, "don'ts" that may well preface the more detailed suggestions which will be found below, and these are addressed to those contemplating the holding of a musical evening, either large or small.

Don't invite people if you cannot make them comfortable; remember that their homes are places of rest and ease, and that unless you can give to them entertainment and comfort they will grudge the hours spent away from their own vines and fig trees.

Don't include mediocre talent among your performers on such an occasion, avoid your best friend, if he or she thinks, without proper foundation for the belief, that musical ability is his or hers.

The Wife of Jules Verne.

She was married at the age of twenty-four; her maiden name was Dufraisey, writes Lucy Hamilton Hooper in a sketch of the homelife and personality of the wife of the clever novelist, in the December Ladies' Home Journal. Her father was an army officer of an ancient family of Perigord. Her marriage has proved an exceptionally happy one. She is the mother of two daughters, and of a son, Michel Verne, who is the youngest of her children, and is just thirty years of age. Her eldest daughter is thirty-eight, and her younger one is thirty-six. All are married, and Madame Verne is the happy ancestress of six little grandchildren.

It has been reported that Jules Verne has been largely aided in the preparation of some of his novels by his intelligent and devoted wife. She herself has hastened to deny the rumor, declaring that she has never taken part, in any fashion, in the literary labors of her husband. "While fully appreciating" (I quote her own words on the subject) "the happiness I enjoy in being the life companion of an intellectual man, to whose career success has not been lacking, I have shared, therefore, the joys, and not the fatigues, of his existence as an author."

The Vice-President's Wife.

Living in France, under equal conditions, Mrs. Levi Parsons Morton, wife of Vice-President Morton, would take her place at the head of the highest in rank of political salons, writes Alice Graham McCollin in an interesting sketch of Mrs. Morton in the December Ladies' Home Journal. Gifted with beauty, dignity, wealth, social standing, and an appreciation of political and governmental methods and practices almost masculine in its quickness of perception and sureness of grasp, she would have found there a society ready to receive her, and to accord her the rank to which these qualities entitle her. But as the wife of an American, their possession secures to her only the position of a social leader, though of one whose abilities and natural rights to precedence are unquestioned. Her training, or experience, at the head of the French Embassy, during Mr. Morton's long ministry, has given her the charm and elegance of manner bred only of such life, and invaluable to a woman of her station.

The French Girl's Hero.

A French girl feels that there is just one companion as delightful as her mother, just one confidant as sympathetic, and that is—her father, writes Henrietta C. Dana in an attractive paper on "The French Girl and her Father" in the December Ladies' Home Journal. He is her hero and the knight of her dreams. Often and often have I seen the girls at school hiding their father's photograph in the leaves of their school books, kissing it enthusiastically on the sly, pressing it to their hearts when they go to chapel to say their prayers, sewing his last letter in their dresses, treasuring some little keepsake in their pockets. And when they meet one can see how the father returns his daughter's feeling by his tender clasp of her pure young hand, and the adoring affection with which he looks down into her eyes. He allows nothing to keep him back from meeting her as she comes from school, and giving her his arm—for every French gentleman extends this mark of protection and respect to the woman of his family; they start off on their long, happy walk, and many a merry romp, many a tender confidence, do they have in the short evening, that follows till her early bedtime at eight o'clock.

Flowers and the Toilet.

The use of natural flowers as an addition to the toilet of a girl—Ah! To forswear this seems a case of lese Majeste to nature, writes Mr. Burton Harrison in the December Ladies' Home Journal. And yet there is reason in the reform that has of late years almost banished the "fair blossoms of a fruitful tree" from wear by their human prototypes. The heroine of the old song who wore a wreath of roses the night when first she met the gentleman whose muse had made her famous, probably left the ball-room under a wilted mass of vegetable matter anything but attractive to the eye or nostril. Corsage bouquets in dancing became an early ruin. Worn in the street, they have been imitated by cheap artificial flowers till the more fastidious have quite dropped them. Carried in the hand at a dance, they are speedily tossed aside upon the nearest point of refuge, or left in the lap of the chaperone until the heavy heads of peevish roses droop in shame at such treatment and drop from their stems to be ignominiously kicked aside by the dancers. "Is it for this," thinks the rose, or the lily of the valley, or the orchid or the violet, "I have come into being?" "Is it for this?" perhaps ruefully echoes the poor young man who has wasted his substance upon paying for the bouquet. The real flower-lover treasures her trophy of this kind at home; watches eagerly for its first symptom of wilting, wraps it in folds of wet tissue paper and consigns it to a cool spot over night and hails with delight its refreshed beauty in the morning. She is satisfied to accept the present edict of fashion which decrees that flowers shall be used in decoration of rooms, not of people. But there is one exception to this general banishment of blossoms from dress, and that is in favor of violets, purple or white, which are always worn, at all times and seasons, with all toilets

Before the Toy Shop Window.

I knows it's mighty weak of me to cry
"N' bubble like a baby, sir, but I
Kaint help them tears.
I'm old enough, I s'pose, to put away
Such childish things: I've known the light o' day
Some sixty years.
It's this way, sir, 'bout thirty years ago
I had a little baby home named Joe—
Named after me—
For Joe's mamma afore she came to die
Ast me to name him that ar way, and I Just did, you see.
Small Joe—well, he was three weeks old that day.
When she—she—kind o' sighed 'n' passed away.
'N' me and Joe
Was left to help each other on—for me
To keep the little fellow goin'; he
To soothe my woe.
He did it too, Joe did—he did a heap.
'Twas mighty comfortin' to watch him sleep.
'N' coo, and smile.
I seemed to see her smile when Joe looked glad.
'N' then I kind o' didn't feel so sad
A little while.

'N' then Joe went! I had to go to town,
'N' Joe while I was gone crept off—to drown—
'Fell in a dam.
'N' down in town I'd bought a little toy
To bring it home, y' know, to give the boy—
A woolly lamb.

'N' when I got back some teller said—
As kindly as he could, that Joe was dead—
'N' my little Joe.
'N' then we put him by his mamma's side,
'N' with him was that woolly lamb that I'd Brought home, y' know.

'N' now today's the first I've cried since then—Cried like a baby in the sight o' men—
But 'tain't no whim,
Why, in the winder o' that shop there sat
A little woolly lamb, sir, just like that I got for him!

'N' for a minute my old heart felt glad,
I sorter thought to see the little lad
Still at my side.

'N' then remembrance came—that ne'er ag'n
I'd see him smile 'n' hear him laugh 'n' then,
Why, then, I cried!

The Home Aquarium.

An aquarium in which plants are grown will not require the changing of water, except occasionally, when the tank needs to be cleaned, writes Maria Parloa in the December Ladies' Home Journal. The growing plants give off oxygen and absorb carbonic acid. To arrange an aquarium with plants, cover the bottom of a glass globe or tank with gravel which has been thoroughly washed: Half fill a small flower pot with earth, and plant in it a small Egyptian lily; then fill the pot with well washed sand. Place the pot in the center of the tank and surround it with stones, so that it may be held in place and, at the same time, concealed. On top of this pot, and around it, in the rocks and gravel, set out a few fine mosses and vines, such as grow in fresh water. Let water cress and hornwort be among them. A north exposure is best for this aquarium. Put in the fish, and feed them with bits of meat, crumbs of bread and worms.

The Wife of Mr. Blaine.

Mrs. Blaine has been a most devoted mother to her children, receiving from them the most extravagant devotion in return for her years of unselfish care, writes Frank Woodberry in a pleasant sketch of the life of the famous statesman in the December Ladies' Home Journal. She is a most brilliant and charming hostess and delightful conversationalist, with fine command of words and graphic power of description.

In appearance, Mrs. Blaine is pleasing. She is rather tall, and in figure is inclined to stoutness. Her hair is changing rapidly from gray to white, and is always well and tastefully arranged. Her eyes are a blue gray; her taste in dress is quiet but elegant.

Unconsciousness, unworldliness, unselfishness and truthfulness, a power to make those who know her enthusiastically devoted to her, an industry almost limitless in its accomplishment, cheerfulness which never fails in the darkest crises, and frankness—these are the characteristics of the woman who, though so little known in her own personality, has reflected in her husband's brilliant successes the strength and nobility of her life.

Women as Presidents.

I think the great mistake make by presiding officers of both sexes is forgetfulness of the fact that they are not called upon to rule the opinions of the meeting, writes M. Louise Thomas, the ex-president of Sorosis, in an article in the December Ladies' Home Journal. I have noticed that men, as much as women, are apt to endeavor to control the action of the meeting over which they had been called upon to preside, and that is something which I consider always objectionable. It is so very clear a matter that the chairman is, merely the pivot upon which the whole matter turns, and not the controlling genius of the sentiments of the meeting, that I am sometimes surprised to see people arrogate to themselves powers which they do not possess, and which were never intended to be conferred upon them.

Making a Good Salad.

Have your salad bowl, which is, of course, one sufficiently large to allow the salad a thorough tossing without sprinkling either the maker or the tablecloth, rubbed with onion, and the lettuce leaves, which have been carefully washed and thoroughly dried, brought to the table in it, writes Frances E. Lanigan in December Ladies' Home Journal. It is well to allow the lettuce to lie in ice water for an hour before you are ready to use it, in order that it may be crisp and cold. Lettuce is one of the things which incorporates with great rapidity any substance with which it comes in contact, and consequently the flavor of the onion becomes a pleasing, but not predominant, portion of the dressing. To make dressing sufficient for from six to ten persons measure with your wooden or silver salad spoon six spoonfuls of oil, to be poured as you measure it upon the lettuce, and the leaves thoroughly tossed in it. Then dissolve in two saladspoonfuls of vinegar two saladspoonfuls of salt, pour over the leaves, and, after another thorough tossing, serve. The great secret of French dressing is, that given the proper proportion, each leaf shall be thoroughly moistened, and for this reason stress is laid upon the tossing and mixing in the bowl. Salad is served after the meat or game course.

The Use of Perfumes.

Nothing is more sinned against today than the use of scents, writes Mrs. Burton Harrison in the December Ladies' Home Journal. To the many people to whom any strong odor is distressing, the present reign of scent bags in the garments of women who frequent public places and public conveyances is intolerable. It is only the faintest suggestion of a refined perfume that should ever be allowed to hang even for a moment about the belongings of a well-bred girl; and even such a casual use of the merest whiff of the dainty and impalpable essence should be rare; to wear any redolence upon her person in sachets is unpardonable.

Mr. Childs to Girls.

My advice to the girls and women with whose educational progress I have in any respect been identified, writes Mr. George W. Childs in an article on "Girls I Have Educated" in the December Ladies' Home Journal, has always been to keep out of debt, to dress plainly, to be careful in their behavior toward men, and as careful in their behavior toward women; to be respectful to their employers, and to be truthful. I have not scrupled to say to them that in my experience the most refined women have been those whose tastes in matters of dress have been most quiet and plain, and that the working girl should above all things avoid extravagance in dress. I have found that girls and women are apt to run into debt for clothes, and whenever such cases have come to my knowledge I have proffered my assistance toward restoring their credit, upon the express stipulation that they should never again put a chain of that sort about their necks.

Hints for the Linen Closet.

Sheets should always be of generous length and width; never less than two yards and three quarters long, with the breadth, of course, depending upon the width of the bed, writes Maria Parloa, in a valuable article on "Furnishing the Linen Closet," in the December Ladies' Home Journal. While linen sheets are desirable, they are not within the means of all housekeepers of even fair incomes. Cotton cloth makes a satisfactory all-the-year-round sheet, and a good quality can be purchased at from twenty-five cents to seventy-five cents per yard, the cloth being from two to two yards and a half wide. Indeed, one can buy good sheets already made, two yards and a half wide, for one dollar and a quarter and one dollar and a half apiece. It is always more economical to buy the cloth and make them at home, for two hems do not mean much work. Unbleached sheeting may be made up, and bleached on the grass. Buy unbleached cotton for servants' sheets and pillow cases, but do not make them too small. If the bed linen be made of generous proportions it will protect the bedding and be more comfortable for the sleepers. Linen sheets, three yards long, can be bought for from five to fifteen dollars per pair. Pillow cases to match sell from two to three dollars and a half a pair. The finest are hemstitched.

Things Worth Knowing.

A two-guinea prize plum pudding: Out of 500 recipes sent the Queen the following was awarded the prize: One pound of raisins, one pound of suet chopped fine, three quarters of a pound of stale bread crumbs, quarter of a pound of brown sugar, grated rind of one lemon, quarter of a pound of flour, one pound of currants, half of a nutmeg, grated; five eggs, half pint of brandy, half pound of mince candy orange peel. Clean, wash and dry the currants. Stone the raisins. Mix all the dry ingredients well together. Beat the eggs; add to them the brandy, then pour them over the dry ingredients and thoroughly mix. Pack into greased small kettles or molds (this will make about six pounds), and boil for six hours at the time of making and six hours when wanted for use. Serve with hard or brandy sauce.

Excellent and economical jelly can be made of the rinds and cores of any good, juicy apples which have been pared for pies or puddings. Every particle of the fruit is thus used.

An ice palace was a feature of a recent charity bazar. It was an open-sided small pavilion, where ices were sold by fair-haired damsels clad in tulle and diamond bepowdered. The edifice glistened and glittered in the electric light and none of the wondering beholders guessed how the effect was produced. The frame was covered with cotton-batting lightly bound on with thread, and then wet from a garden hose with a weak solution of mucilage. It was then plentifully sprinkled with powdered mica, which was procured at a drug store.

When the edge of a rose-blanket becomes worn it may be very neatly buttonholed with Scotch yarn or worsted to match the borders in color.

To clean zinc: Wipe it perfectly dry so that there will be no water in it, then pour in kerosene, a little at a time, and scrub well with a scrubbing-brush and all the black spots will come off that will not with water. When sufficiently clean pour in boiling hot water. This cleans sinks and bathtubs beautifully.

HEALTHFULNESS OF UTAH CLIMATE.

If people who have never visited Utah should judge its climate from what boomers have written, they would, no doubt, expect on coming here to find the healthiest and most delightful climate on earth. But in this essay the writer will try to do justice alike to its merits and its demerits.

To begin with, let us consider its constitutional effect upon the people. In the first place, it causes them to grow tall. This is noticeable in the contrast between European parents and their Utah reared children. The former may be short, stout, people; the children will generally be tall, lithe, and agile. "This is due mostly to the climate." Where the air is light and pure, children feel more nimble and cheerful. In this condition they exercise all their muscles, and exercise, quite as much as the limestone in our water, makes them grow.

It also affects greatly the complexion, the hair, and the beard. The climate of Wales, for instance, is damp and heavy, the sun scarcely ever shining. But the complexion of people coming from there is very white, and the hair very dark and oily. This is seen in the missionary who has been laboring there. When he leaves home he may have very dark skin and light hair, but on his return what a change is seen! His hands and face are soft and white, his hair and beard a shade or two darker. But place him again on his farm, and in a very short time, he is the same parched stick he was before.

Then, of course, the climate has more or less to do with the workings of our minds. In an extremely hot climate how are the minds developed? Not at all. All the inhabitants of such a climate care for is something to eat and drink. This is also true in a very cold climate. The mind is dormant. But in a climate like ours, mild, pure and invigorating, the mind is always active, bright, and inventive. And is it any wonder when nature spreads around us material in every form, for our minds to exercise upon?

The mountains of Utah not only assist in making our climate so healthful, but they infuse into the hearts of the people an intense love for liberty, a love seldom found in places where no lofty peaks are seen and no heaven-distilled breezes fill the lungs.

Many people come to Utah from all parts of the world to try her climate in curing consumption, asthma, and kindred diseases. Consumptives are especially benefited by breathing our light, pure air, and traveling through our many canyons. Where they are not cured grim death is baffled for many a year.

But persons suffering from catarrh should never come here thinking to improve their health, as our climate favors such a disease. They should seek a seaside home, where they can breathe moist air.

We are occasionally visited with diphtheria, scarlet fever, mumps, measles and whooping cough; but with good care these diseases can be prevented from spreading over a community and sweeping half the people away. It is not so in countries where the climate is not naturally so free from disease germs. So that even in contagious diseases we can claim much for our climate.

Some very rare cases of small pox, typhoid fever and other like diseases are seen in Utah, but they are generally carried here from other regions, and are checked and stamped out before spreading far. In some few places where the surface is swampy, or where, as in cities, there is no drainage, malarial diseases occasionally appear; but this is no fault of the climate.

Anyone wishing a healthy constitution, a beautiful form, strong mental powers, and a love for human freedom, should come to Utah, the finest climate on earth to increase these qualities.

JUDGE HOGE EXCUSSED.

Immediately after roll call President Loofbourrow announced that Judge Hoge, who was present, had pressing business elsewhere and recommended that he be excused from the rest of the meeting. There was no objection and Judge Hoge left the council chamber.

The minutes of the previous meeting were read and approved.

COAL DEALERS' QUERIES.

Westenholme & Morris, Elieberck Bros., J. S. Morse & Sons, R. M. Wilkinson, Diamond Coal company and Salt Lake Coal company sent in the following communication:

To the Honorable Mayor and City Council:

Gentlemen:—In order to fully comply with the requirements of the ordinance regulating the sale and delivery of coal to the public, we would like the following information:

First. At what place must we get coal weighed?

Second. In what manner do you wish to weigh the coal sold to farmers and others who come to the coal yards with their own teams?

Third. Coal that is sold by wholesale car loads and delivered f. o. b. cars, how do you wish to weigh and furnish certificate of weight?

Fourth. To the poor people who purchase 50 or 100 pounds at the coal yards and haul away in hand wagons, how do the city wish to furnish certificates?

Fifth—Should a buyer decide to take the coal at the coal company's weights and pay for same, may he do so, either hauling it himself, or have the company haul it, do the work without the city certificate of weight?

Sixth—Will it be required of all teams hauling coal to first visit the city's scales and be weighed for light weight of wagons and horses, each load or only once a day?

Seventh—Will the city be prepared to weigh and certify on 1500 to 2000 loads and the same later weights in ten hours, beginning at 7 o'clock a. m. each day?

Eighth—Will the city appoint a supervisor or coal inspector with whom we may confer in regards to rules and plans of action in the expediting of business and all the needs of the buyers of coal so as to make the least delay?

Nine—To whom will the difference, if any, be given by the city between weighing on scales that weigh horses and wagon, and those that weigh wagons only, as there is usually a difference from 50 to 100 pounds?

Ten—Should a difference in weight appear at any time, what would be considered by the Council as the least difference to be a cause for action against the coal companies by the purchaser?

We would respectfully suggest that the city immediately erect four or more ten-ton scales at a point on Third West near First South, whereby there would be a saving to the public of 25 cents per ton or fraction of a ton, as we have been informed by coal haulers that the drayage on coal will be at least 40 cents per ton or fraction of a ton more than at present, when said coal is hauled to the city weight scales, where now located—which 40 cents added to the cost of weighing, say 10 cents, will add to the present cost of coal 50 cents per ton or fraction of a ton when weighed over city scales.

Committee on markets.

FOR EXPERT TESTIMONY.

Professor H. Hirsching, chemist, sent in a bill for $100 for giving expert testimony in the recent tonnage suit against the city heard before Judge Miller at Ogden. The bill was "O K'd" by City Attorney Hoge. Referred to the committee on claims.

THEY WANT LIGHT.

W. C. Reilly and others asked for an electric light on Kendall street. Committee on improvements.

ABATEMENTS ASKED.

Henry Wagner asked an abatement of sidewalk tax, having constructed his own sidewalk by permission of the City Council, Board of public works.

W. L. Binder asked for the abatement of a watermain extension assessment, giving reasons. Committee on waterworks.

POLICEMEN APPOINTED.

The chief of police and mayor sent in a communication appointing R. C. Brown as policeman to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Carl Birkner; also J. C. Davis to succeed P. Heeman Duke who was appointed to drive the patrol wagon. Confirmed.

A CREMATORY COMPANY'S BOND.

The mayor sent in a communication in which he recommended that the bond of the Engle Crematory and Crematory company of Iowa be referred to the city attorney. So ordered.

ONEY FOR THE EAGLE GATE.

The committee on improvements reported as follows in the matter of the petition of Spencer Clawson and others: We think the city should protect old land marks and monuments, and we also think the public have contributed so liberally in this worthy cause of replacing the old Eagle Gate, we recommend that the City Council appropriate the amount asked in the petition, $1778.19, and that it be placed on the appropriation list. Adopted.

FEWER EXTENSION.

The committee on sewerage reported in the matter of the petition of the board of education for extension of sewer laterals, that the same be granted and that the city engineer be instructed to return an estimate of cost to the Council, provided said cost of sewerage construction shall be borne by the petitioner. Received and filed.

DON'T WANT A POLICE MATRON.

In the matter of the petition of the Rev. R. G. McNiece and others asking for the appointment of a police matron, the committee on police reported that they did not think it advisable to recommend the appointment at the present, as the city did not have suitable rooms and other necessary accommodations for such persons. Adopted.

SIMONDt GETS ECONOMICAL.

Simondt then took the floor and moved that the vote whereby an appropriation of $1778.19 was made to complete the Eagle Gate be reconsidered. He said he was not in favor of giving any such amount for the purpose for which it was given. He was busy he said, when the matter passed and therefore said nothing in regard to it. He thought that the parties most directly interested in the improvement should foot the bill and not the city.

Hardy—Did you vote on the proposition, Mr. Simondt?

Simondt—No, I did not.

Hardy—Then you cannot move to reconsider now.

The chair—The point is well taken. However, I would like very much to have the motion reconsidered as I think the amount appropriated exorbitant.

Simondt and Loofbourrow only were antagonistic to the appropriation which was accordingly let unchanged.

The following communication was received from the city auditor and after a good deal of discussion referred to the city attorney:

To the Honorable President and City Council:

Gentlemen:—I herewith return for your further action bill of sewerage department against the Utah Central railway, the amount of which I was instructed by your honorable body to withhold from warrant No. 7924 for $487.51 issued in their favor on October 28, 1892. The railway company refused to allow the amount of the city's bill to be deducted. I also enclose for your action writs of execution against the Utah Central railway in favor of J. C. Smith, Alonzo Wallace, Henry Hully and E. C. Coffin Hardware company. Also one against John A. Davenport, policeman, in favor of Louis Bamret.

E STREET SEWER.

The city engineer reported in the matter of the petition of P. L. Williams and others relative to constructing a sewer on E street from present terminus of sewer to Third street, that the limits of sewer district No. 3 extend only to a point half way between Second and Third streets, and to extend the sewer to Third streets, would be to carry it into territory not now embraced within the limits of any sewer district. I accordingly submit estimate of the cost for extending the sewer to the limits of district No. 3, instead of to Third street. The cost of constructing such a sewer will be about $2475 which apportioned among the front feet of property abutting the improvement will be at the rate of $1.57 1/2 per front foot. Committee on Sewerage.

HAS BEEN RESTORED.

The same official reported in the matter of the petition of Elias Morris relative to roadway obstructed through the operations of William Harkins who is working a gravel pit near the Warm Springs under a lease from the city, that the road in question has been restored to its original condition and further action on the part of the Council is therefore unnecessary. Filed.

On recommendation of the city attorney the proposition was rejected.

PRIESTHOOD MEETING.

The regular monthly meeting of the Priesthood of the Salt Lake Stake of Zion convened in the Assembly Hall at 11 a. m. today, Saturday, December 3rd, 1892. President Angus M. Cannon presiding. Present also upon the stage, Counsellors Joseph E. Taylor and Charles W. Penrose; Patriarchs Aloah H. Raleigh, William J. Smith and Joseph Horne; Elders George B. Wallace and William C. Dunlap, of the presidency of the High Priests' quorum, and other High Priests and Elders. All the wards of the Stake were properly represented, excepting the Twelfth, Fifteenth and Sixteenth city wards, and Farmers and Pleasant Green wards.

Thirteen Presidents of Seventies and eleven home missionaries responded to the roll call. Twelve quorums of Elders were represented by their presiding officers, viz: the First, Second, Seventh, Thirteenth, Fourteenth, Fifteenth, Seventeenth, Eighteenth, Nineteenth, Twentieth, Twenty-first and Twenty-second quorums. The Sabbath schools of the Stake were represented by Superintendent Thomas C. Griggs.

The usual business being dispatched, remarks were made in the following order by the speakers named.

COUNSELLOR CHARLES W. PENROSE spoke of the tendency in some of the wards to crowd too much labor upon one man. He did not think this wise and advised the Bishops to utilize all the material they might have, and distribute the labors both for the good of the individual and that of the people. He also referred to an instance where a man, a member of the Church, was refused membership in a certain ward upon a Bishop's recommendation, because the certificate failed to state the Priesthood that the man held. He thought this was altogether too technical. A man entitled to a certificate ought to be received as a ward member irrespective of his Priesthood; though all men should have certificates of their ordination in the Priesthood to carry with them. The rule of taking recommends from one ward to another is one that should be encouraged. It was very often neglected, but ought not to be. Even a Deacon was entitled to and should have certificate of his ordination.

BISHOP GEORGE R. JONES

touched upon the same topic, that of members of the Church floating about from place to place without recommendation—and asked what should be done with them in order that they might have a standing in the ward where they resided.

PRESIDENT ANGUS M. CANNON answered that Bishops should ascertain the antecedents of such members, from the authorities of the wards whence they came, be on taking steps either to receive them by baptism or prior to dealing with them on a fair fellow-ship. Members who did not bring recommendations with them should be looked after by the Bishop of the ward where they had taken up their abode as carefully as the most able members of that ward. The President spoke of the imperfect records kept in the various wards and urged the Bishops to institute a reform in this respect. He also dwelt upon the prevalent practice of evil speaking among the Saints, and explained the proper course for members of the Church to pursue who had feelings against their brethren or sisters. It was not to backbite and slander and complain of them upon the street corners, but to first go to the person offending and let him or her know of it, then, if it could not be settled in that way, the Teachers should act as peacemakers. After that, if necessary, came the Bishop's court and the High Council. God's House was a house of order, and the humblest member of the Church, as well as the highest in authority, was amenable to the laws of the Church, and there was justice therein for all. The gathering up of means for the completion of the Salt Lake Temple, according to the apportionment recently made, was also mentioned, and the Bishops exhorted to diligence in this matter. They had the right to revise and change, according to their best judgment, that lists furnished them by the Presidency of the State, but the amounts set down were expected to be paid. It was better that one man should be involved for a hundred dollars or more than that the Temple should be in debt when ready to be dedicated. For himself he would rather sell all that he had and devote the results to the building of the Lord's House than to have it in debt or fail to be dedicated at the time appointed.

The meeting adjourned until the first Saturday in January, 1893.

MURDEROUS APACHES.

The following is a special to the Ogden Standard, from Colonia Juarez, Mexico, bearing date November 25th:

The Deming Headlight contains an account of the killing of two Mexican officers by the Apaches. The account states that fifty Mexican soldiers were sent out from Palomito to intercept Captain Kid and his band of thirteen warriors on their way back to the Sierra Madre mountains. While traveling along the foot hills about sixty-eight miles southwest from Palomito the soldiers were ambushed by the Indians and the two officers in charge who were traveling in advance of their party were shot through the head and the soldiers completely routed, the Indians retreating into the mountains. The officers killed were sent to Chihuahua for burial, and the government was notified, whereupon, an order was issued for five hundred men to be dispatched immediately to the mountains, to be stationed near the colonies of Pochecho and Juarez.

Last Saturday Holeman Pratt and your correspondent started for the mountain colonies for the purpose of assisting in locating forts and plans of protection in times of danger where the families of the colonists could be gathered and guarded by a few men, thus leaving others to assist in repelling attacks. Leaving here about 6 o'clock we soon reached the mountains and began the ascent, traveling all night through forests and pines, deep canyons and beautiful little valleys.

We arrived at Pochecho at 4 o'clock next morning. After a few hours' rest at the house of Bishop Jesse N. Smith, Jr., we met with the people at their noon services. As the hour of meeting arrived I was very forcibly reminded of pictures I have seen of the early settlers of America attending church. Each family as they came out of their homes was guarded by the male members, armed with Winchester rifles and pistols, and when the congregation had all gathered, each corner of the little church was stacked with rifles.

After consulting with the people it was unanimously decided to erect a stockade fence of pine trees with stone bastions on each corner around the schoolhouse, thus making a fort 100x125 feet. In the evening I accompanied with Bishop Smith and Bishop Henry Lunt, late of Cedar City, Utah, we went to Corrales, and the people there decided to build a fort on a little hill overlooking all the houses. Monday morning Bishop Smith accompanied us over to Cave valley, the headquarters of the Apaches when in the Sierra Madre mountains. Here the people decided to fortify immediately and bring in all scattered families.

The mountain settlements and the colonies of Juarez each now have a military organization of well armed men with complete outfits divided into companies of ten with a captain over each ten, and are called out twice a month for drill and target practice.

After meeting with the people of Cave Valley, Holeman Pratt and I rode over to visit the celebrated caves. Hitching our horses in a little clump of cherry trees near the river, with rifle in hand we began climbing the mountain just below one of the principal caves. Trails leading up the mountain are worn into the solid rock over a foot deep. This cave is about fifteen feet high. In the mouth is a large olla built for holding grain, just back of which the cave is divided off into compartments with port holes and windows. These rooms extend back hundreds of feet, and it is said that one of them contains a large olla of several thousands of gallons capacity, nicely sealed and its contents are a mystery to all visitors, but on account of the lateness of the evening and not knowing if Captain Kid intended recruiting up in these caves for a few days we concluded to wait till a more favorable time for visiting the Interior. In the mouth of this cave is a pool containing about ten gallons of clear cold water supplied by a little spring coming out of the rocks immediately above. On the opposite side of the canyon are other large caves located higher up in the mountains and from which a large mummy was taken a few years ago by a company of scientific men from the United States.

Next morning we visited another large cave, riding our horses into the mouth of it. This cave like the other one is well fortified up inside and is so arranged that the entire canyon leading up to it can be covered with a few rifles from the fort's interior. A small body of well armed men with supplies in these caves could defy the entire Mexican army.

Dr. Moser of the B. Y. Academy made us a visit last week and organized Church schools. In Juarez he was surprised to find a well graded free school supported entirely by the people. JOSEPH C. BENTLEY.

NOTES.

*The new sewer system of Phoenix A. T., is completed.

Thousands of fruit trees are being planted in and about Prescott, A. T.

Beet pulp is being shipped from Grand Island, Nebraska, to neighboring towns.

Eddy, N. M., has a new six-column folio daily newspaper called the Current.

The citizens of Yuma, Yuma county, have raised $4000 towards the erection of a flour mill for that town.

The Alvarado, (Alameda county) beet sugar factory has finished work on beets, having cut 15,000 tons this season.

The Norfolk, Nebraska, sugar beet factory closed for the season last week after making 885 barrels of granulated sugar.

A new business block, to cost $200,000, is being contracted for at Phoenix, Arizona. It will be built by San Francisco capitalists.

Frank Williams and Frank Lewis, the famous LaSalle (Colorado) train robbers, have been sentenced by Judge Downer in the district court to thirteen years' imprisonment at hard labor.

Grain threshing has been going on at a lively rate in Larimer county, Wyoming, during the present spell of fine weather, but there is much of the harvest to be threshed yet.

In Nebraska the farmers are husking their corn, and the weather is favorable for drying the crop. A few farmers are selling their corn and oats at 20 cents a bushel, but they are renters. Farmers generally are holding on for higher prices.

In the United States circuit court at Carson, Nevada, the case of the United States government against United States Marshal Kelley's bondsmen to recover $2000, judgment was rendered in favor of the government in the amount of $498. Ex-Governor Adams was one of Kelley's bondsmen.

A fire broke out near the tunnel of the coal mines at Blossberg, New Mexico, recently. The flames were sucked into the tunnel and made their way inward toward the central workings, burning the track and timbers. These mines are very extensive and produce seventy-five cars of coal per day.

In the supreme court of Idaho on Tuesday the writs of mandamus against Auditor George, of Logan county, were applied for. The court remanded the matter to the district court of Logan county, which is now in session, and which, in the opinion of the court, had original jurisdiction in the cases.

Hon. Silas Alexander, the newly appointed territorial secretary of New Mexico, has taken the oath of office. He has much to occupy his time as the legislature meets December 28th. Mr. Alexander is a native of Pennsylvania. He has been in the Rocky Mountains some fifteen years, first locating in San Juan, Col., and thence removing to Hillsboro, about twelve years ago.

Peter Logue has been killed in a mine at Aspen, Colorado. As the men were going down the ladder in the electric winze, a miner named John Murmain slipped and knocked Peter Logue off the ladder. Logue fell from between the third and fourth levels to the sixth level and rolled down the winze, to the seventh level, a distance of 375 feet. He was crushed all out of shape.

News has just been received at Albuquerque, New Mexico, that Elias D. Bergout, a well-known citizen of Kingman, a small town west of this city, in Arizona, cut his throat from ear to ear with a razor, severing the jugular vein. Although prospering, he was of a melancholy disposition and on several occasions threatened to take his life. He was undoubtedly temporarily insane when he killed himself. He leaves a wife.

Adjutant General Kennedy and Major Manford Smith have taken a flying trip over to the Indian reservation, says the Aspen (Colorado) Times, for the purpose of finding out whether the Redskins are on their reservation or killing game in Garfield county. They departed Sunday morning. The adjutant general has no hair on his head to lose, while the major's pompadour locks would be sadly missed, and it is to be hoped he will take no chances.

Another big strike was made in the Surprise mine at Cook's Peak, New Mexico, last week. It is said to be the biggest strike yet made in the district. A cave was broken into which is 800 feet long with ore the entire length of it. The ore runs 60 per cent lead and 8 ounces in silver per ton. Cook's Peak is one of the best camps in New Mexico, and the production of the mines there is increasing rapidly. The strikes which have been made there this year indicate that the mountains are full of caves of rich mineral.

A colony of twelve families, all English farmers, arrived at Albuquerque, New Mexico, last week direct from London, England, accompanied by A. F. Spaw, president and founder of the American Colonization company. They have purchased lands in the famous Rio Puerco valley near that city, and will enter largely into the fruit-raising business. Mr. Spaw expects a dozen more families from England by the next steamer. Those already there are a better class of emigrants than was expected and all have considerable money.

K. Kohlenturg, a homesteader near Eddy, New Mexico, realizes a net return of $500 annually from his dairy. When the sage was plowed up last spring, he bought 100 stands of bees. They have not been allowed to swarm.

They have made fifty pounds of honey for each colony, but half of it only has been taken from them. The honey has sold readily at twenty cents a pound for comb, and twenty-five for extract, bringing $500. There is only one piece of alfalfa near there, but when all those places are in alfalfa, the bees will do better.

AFTER RARE BOOKS.

It has been thought, or, rather, more correctly speaking, only fondly hoped, by the learned men throughout Christendom, that among the rubbishy chronicles of the Kalrouin there would some day be found the missing classics, the lost books of Euclid and Livy among others, says the Fortnightly Review. Indeed, in some of the more ancient books of travel on Morocco it is expressly stated that many of the manuscripts that were saved from the burning of the Alexandrian library were taken to Seville, Granada, and Fez. In weighing these statements I think it should be remembered that the Kalrouin was founded at the very least 100 years after the fire that was so disastrous to learning, and that these manuscripts would have had a lot of knocking about before they found a home on the shelves in the subterranean cellars of the Kalrouin. I think it possible on leaving Seville and Granada the Moors may have brought with them to Morocco many of the precious volumes which are known to have been in these libraries, but which have now disappeared.

For the last fifty years it has been the effort of every European minister accredited to Morocco to obtain some information regarding these treasures, but the sultan has always sturdily asserted that there were no books at all in the Kalrouin, or that they had crumbled into dust from age long centuries ago. My inquiries, though hardly in a measure commensurate with the labor and amount of time expended, were certainly more successful. There can be no two opinions as to the presence of a very large number of ancient manuscripts in the Kalrouin library, and these volumes—a creditable thing for the lazy and indolent Moors—are certainly the object of very great care. The trustees of the Kalrouin have a regular staff of custodians chosen from the university professors and teachers, who are charged with the safekeeping of the books, and the cellars are annually inspected, and the books repaired when the necessity arises. I should say that, but accidents of fire, in the future, when the library is thrown open, the manuscripts will be found in a very fair state of preservation.

Upon another point my informants all agreed. They said that in the library there are quite a number of books written in strange, unknown tongues. Generally, my gaulish Tholba friends asserted, they were written in Greek, but on my showing them a book in German they were unanimously of opinion that this was the language in which the volumes were written. So I am forced to the conclusion that our writing which is not Arabic is Greek to the Fukes and Tholba of Fez.

THE LIGHT that failed—the comet.

REMARKS

Made by President George G. Cannon, at the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City,
Utah, Sunday, Nov. 20, 1892.

[REPORTED BY ARTHUR WINTER.]

Brother H. S. Gowan's remarks have suggested some reflections, and I would like, if I can have the Spirit, to express them. I will read a little of the law of Moses to be found in the 21st chapter of Exodus:

And if any mischief follow, then thou shalt give life for life.

Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot.

Burning for burning, wound for wound, stripes for stripes.

Now I will read to you the law of the Gospel on these points as revealed and taught by Jesus:

Again, ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time, Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths:

But I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by heaven, for it is God's throne:

Nor by the earth; for it is his footstool: neither by Jerusalem; for it is the city of the great King.

Neither shalt thou swear by thy head, because thou canst not make one hair white or black.

But let your communication be, Yes, yes; Nay, nay: for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil.

Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth:

But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also.

And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also.

And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain.

Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away.

Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy.

But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you:

That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.

For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same?

And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so?

Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.

In these verses that I have read in your hearing are found the two laws. One is a law that was given to a people just emerging from slavery and bondage, a degraded people, incapable of receiving any higher law than that of retaliation. It may be called a law of carnal commandments. They were not able to receive the higher law of the Gospel, and this law of "an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth" was given unto them by their lawgiver, Moses. The reasons for it are very evident. Those who have traced the history of the children of Israel after they emerged from Egypt can readily understand how apparently incapable they were of comprehending the higher law which Jesus taught in the words that I have read in your hearing. They were a people who could not rise to the comprehension of doing good for evil, of returning kindness for unkindness. As soon as they emerged from Egypt, notwithstanding the many manifestations of God's kindness and of His miraculous power which they witnessed, they were ready to turn round and stone Moses. They asked him if there were not graves enough in the land of Egypt that he should bring them and their children into the wilderness to perish. After they had been led through the Red Sea and delivered by the power of God; after they had had water brought forth from the rock; after they had had quails sent to them; after manna itself, the food of heaven, had been sent to them for their daily sustenance; even then they were ready to stone the man through whom God did these mighty works, and they had no confidence apparently in Moses beyond his supplying their daily wants. To such people this law of retaliation was given. But Jesus came, and He taught a higher law; He taught the law of the Gospel, the law that pertains to the celestial kingdom of God—a law which, if obeyed, would lift men nearly to the level of angels. That law was that they should return good for evil, kindness for unkindness; that they should pray for those who despitefully used them; that they should be generous even to those who injured them; that they should salute their enemies and show favor unto them; for if they did not do this they were no better than the publicans.

As Latter-day Saints, we are under this law. God requires us to practice these principles that Jesus taught, and unless we do so we are not the children of God, we are not Latter-day Saints. We may call ourselves by the holiest of titles; we may vaunt our religion to the skies; we may declare that we have had communion with God, and have been ministered to by holy angels, and have had revelations from Him; but I say to you today in this congregation, unless we live up to these principles which Jesus taught, we are not the true disciples of the Son of God, and we will be found wanting in the day of the Lord Jesus. We cannot return hate for hate and be justified in doing so. We cannot return evil for evil and expect God to sustain us in doing it. I do not care who the men are that indulge in that spirit, I say to you, my brethren and sisters, this day, in the presence of God, that if they do this they will lose the Spirit of God. That Spirit will withdraw itself from them and they will be left in darkness. There is no justification for any such thing. On the contrary, all the words of God pronounce against such a spirit and feeling. I cannot speak evil of my brother and be justified in doing it. I cannot do wrong to my brother, no matter what his wrong may be to me, and be justified. God will not sustain me in it, neither will He you. Those who do this may think they have justification for it, but they cannot, in the spirit of the Gospel, have any such justification.

I wanted to bear my testimony to this, in line with the teachings that Brother Gowan and Brother James H. Anderson have given to us this afternoon. I know that their teachings are correct, and I believe, just as Brother Gowan has stated, that men who have endured many trials and passed through many ordeals, will, if they are not careful, lose the Spirit of God and get into darkness, and be led astray, and imagine that they are justified before the Lord in taking the course that they do take. It is for each one of us to live so humbly and so meekly before the Lord that we shall not grieve His Holy Spirit and not offend our brothers and our sisters; and maintain their fellowship, their God without grieving the Spirit of God, and he will have to answer for it. Can I, in my position, do this with *good feeling and their faith for us. If we felt as we should do, rather than offend one of "these little ones" we would get down on our knees before them and confess our wrongs to them. Jesus warned the people in His day on this point. Says He: "Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones; for I say unto you, that in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven." No man can offend the humblest member of the family of my humble brethren? No, I cannot. It is as obligatory upon me, or upon President Woodruff, or upon President Smith, or upon any of the Twelve Apostles, as it is upon the humblest member in the Church, not to offend, not to grieve, not to wound our brethren and our sisters, either in thought, word or act. God requires this of us, and we must comply with that requirement or we shall grieve His Holy Spirit and it will depart from us. You know what Paul has said about charity:

Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal.

And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing.

And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing.

I desire to bear my testimony in accord with the testimony of my brethren who have spoken, and to draw a distinction in your minds between the law of Moses, given to an ignorant and a degraded people, and the law of Jesus, given to His disciples, and given to us in these days, that we may know the difference and be led by the Spirit to take the right course before Him. I pray God that this may be the case with all of us, in the name of Jesus. Amen.

COURT PROCEEDINGS.

There has been nothing to excite particular attention in the courts today. In Judge Zane's department the first matter called up was that of the American Publishing Co. vs. the Fisher Brewing Co., which yesterday looked like going over for the term. This morning, however, rather than risk so great a delay, Attorney Rawlins consented to the case being finished before eleven jurors, as there was not the least prospect of the sick jurymen returning. Therefore the trial went on with the taking of further testimony. The arguments may finish today; at all events, the case should go to the jury not later than Friday, if no more unforeseen obstacles block the way.

CANNOT PROCEED TODAY.

The case mentioned in yesterday's News as having begun before Judge Anderson, as referee, had to be continued until tomorrow (or longer if need be) in consequence of counsel engaged in it being occupied in Judge Zane's court today.

A RELEASE FROM THE "PEN."

A convict whose term in the penitentiary has expired was set free this morning. He was Michael Murphy, convicted at Ogden of housebreaking, and sentenced on December 8th, 1890, to two years and six months' imprisonment.

IN A NEW CHARACTER.

Ex-Warden Sam Parsons has not been long out of a job. He left the penitentiary last week to make room for his successor there. Now he has received the appointment of a deputy marshal, at the hands of Marshal Benton, and will take up his abode at Provo. Sam is no stranger there, and his return will be welcomed by a host of old friends.

THE ALLEGED HORSETHIEVES.

An account was given in Monday's News of the chase after two alleged horse thieves, and their subsequent capture by Deputy Marshal Will Goodsell and a man in the employ of Messrs. Mount and Griffin, coal dealers of this city. The accused men are William Golden and James T. McMurray. They were brought down from the penitentiary this morning to have a hearing before Commissioner Greenman; but, waiving examination, they were held to answer to the grand jury in a bond of $500 each. Golden's relatives live somewhere in Iowa, and his greatest anxiety appears to be to keep from them the tidings of his present trouble. It is evident, however, that he is a man possessed of considerable gait, as he begged of Mr. Mount, one of the prosecutors, to "go his bond." But Mr. Mount couldn't see the force of it, and in default of finding sureties the defendants will have to spend Christmas and New Years in the penitentiary.

THE HORSE WAS SHOT.

A short time ago J. H. Carboneite and E. F. Hart hired a horse and outfit from Thos. McEvoy's livery stables. It is alleged that while they had the animal out it got so badly injured that the owner was obliged to have it shot; and he now claims $200 as damages in Commissioner Greenman's court. The case was set for hearing today.

SUITS FILED.

W. S. McCornick brought suit today in the Third District court against John G. Morrison to recover $6824.68 (with interest at the rate of 1 per cent), money lent.

Francis Fritsch and M. R. Wyker are plaintiffs and Jennie Holcomb, J. F. Pender and G. C. Shaffer the defendants in a suit to recover about $160 on a promissory note, with interest.

Abraham Jeffs and Elmer E. Merritt today filed an action against John R. Howard and wife in the Third District court. The suit is brought to have a certain conveyance made by Howard to his wife set aside upon the ground that the transfer was made to prevent the property from being applied upon a judgment which the plaintiffs have heretofore secured against the first named defendant for $2250.

Peter Bossard has also entered a suit in the Third District Court against George W. Gill and demands judgment against the defendant for $6500. Bossard alleges that he was employed by Gill as a mining expert to examine and report in the French language upon the Northern Chief mining property, and in the event that the property was sold he was to receive $5000 as his compensation. He alleges that the mine has been sold but that he has not received his money. The remaining $1800 is alleged to be due for similar services on the Centennial Eureka mine.

A LEGAL VISITOR.

Judge Macmillan, county attorney of Ogden, was a visitor at the Third District court this morning.

This has been a thin morning for the local newspapers within the radius of the courts. Chief Justice Zane, on taking his seat at 10 o'clock, found awaiting him a Canadian named Henry Fares who, having taken up his residence permanently in Summit county, was anxious to share in the advantages of American citizenship. His honor put to the applicant the usual string of questions, which were answered satisfactorily, and Clerk McMillan then administered the oath, calling upon Mr. Fares to "renounce for ever all allegiance" to Queen Victoria, of whom he is a subject.

MAY FINISH TODAY.

The case of the American Publishing company, vs. the Fisher Brewing company, which has enjoyed a monopoly of the Third District court during the past week, was then taken up once more. It may go to the jury late today; but surely have been the ups and downs witnessed since the trial of the action began, that it is hardly safe to predict far ahead in regard to the ultimatum.

A TEMPORARY STOP.

The litigation over the promissory notes which was opened before Judge Anderson, as referee, two days ago, has been delayed owing to Attorneys Rawlins and Critchlow being engaged in doing battle for the Fisher Brewing company in Judge Zane's court. When this is done with the hearing before the referee will be resumed.

SATURDAY'S MOTIONS.

Tomorrow is "motion day" in Judge Zane's court. It, however, the original arrangement is carried out the case of the Banks against County Collector Hardy will be called for hearing.

WILL VISIT WASHINGTON.

Ex-Marshall Parsons expects to reach Washington next Monday. He has gone there partly on business.

SHORT ORDERS BY JUDGE ZANE.

In the case of Parker and Dupue vs. the Metropolitan Investment Company (default), a decree was entered in favor of the plaintiffs.

Rachel Hamlin vs. George Hamlin. This case was dismissed.

The suit of Margaret A. Erickson vs. Albert T. Erickson was, by consent of counsel, referred to Judge Anderson to report findings of facts, etc., to the court.

TWO DIVORCE SUITS.

Annie Fields this morning filed a suit for divorce in the Third District Court against her husband, Charles E. Fields.

The parties were married at Eastport City, Maine, in September, 1880, and the grounds alleged in the complaint are cruelty and failure to provide. The plaintiff mentions the names of three unmarried women, former servants in the household, to whom the defendant made indecent proposals, and says that by reason of his several acts of cruelty she has been in constant fear of him and can no longer live with him. For a period of more than two years past, she states, her husband has, by his idleness and profligacy, neglected to provide for her the common necessities of life and compelled her to support herself and minor children, which she has done by her own earnings as clerk in a store. There is issue of the marriage, Rosa M. Field, aged 11, and Abner George, aged 9.

G. W. Boyd is the plaintiff's attorney.

THE OTHER SUFFERER.

Emma Yider vs. John David Yider. This is another divorce suit filed today in which the plaintiff is represented by Attorneys Richards & Moyle.

The marriage of the parties took place in this city in February, 1876, and there are now living, as issue of the marriage, Charles D., born January 11th, 1877; Lewis W., born June 28th, 1877; Annie E., born October 9th, 1878; Albert V., born November 10th, 1880; Benjamin H., born September 10th, 1882; and Ernest, born September 20th, 1884. On May 6th, 1886, the complaint recites, defendant was adjudged by the Probate court of Davis county to be insane, and he has ever since been confined in the Provo asylum, his insanity being (plaintiff alleges) incurable. Her husband, for more than two years prior to May 6th, 1886, though able-bodied and capable, having been in the constant receipt of sufficient wages, wilfully neglected to provide for herself and family the bare necessities of life. In March, 1884, he abandoned her without cause, and continued to live apart from her for more than a year immediately before he became insane.

Plaintiff asks for the custody of the minor children, and that a guardian ad litem be appointed to represent her in this action.

THAT'S BUSINESS.

The new U. S. Marshal has evidently made up his mind that the apartments reserved for his deputies in the Dooly building shall not be converted into a temporary resting-place for individuals having no good reason for calling there during any portion of the day or night. The following pen and ink notice on a large sheet of cardboard has been affixed to the panel of the door: "No lounging about these rooms. They are for deputies. Please keep out. I. A. Benton, Marshal." The inscription is written in such a large, bold hand that he who runs may read.

The Colorado Iron Works company through its Chicago office, has secured the contract for the machinery for a large nickel smelting plant, consisting of engines, boilers, water jacket furnaces, dryers, concentrating mill, wire rope tramway, etc., to be erected on the property of the International Nickel Mining company at Riddles, Ore.

PROVO LETTER.

Provo, Dec. 7.—In county court yesterday, in response to a petition from citizen of Mepleton precinct, Selectmen Holdaway and Jones recommended the establishment of a new county road in said precinct, as soon as the petitioners should file with the county clerk a grant of the right of way of such a road, signed by the respective land owners concerned. The report was adopted.

Judge Jones and Selectman Holdaway reported that material was on the ground, and Andrews Brothers would soon commence work on the new iron bridge which is to span Provo river, on the county road northwest of the city. The five hundred dollars, the committee further reported, which had been appropriated, had been spent in paying freight and in changing the course of the river. Another $500 was asked for. The report was accepted and the requested appropriation made.

Deputy Marshal B. Bachman yesterday sold at auction to V. L. Halliday, the Central building for $8,000. It is understood that Mr. Halliday purchased the building for other parties. The building was sold to satisfy a judgment in favor of the builders, amounting to $9,234.61. The structure is a solid stone and brick one; but is incomplete. It was erected by the Central Building company on property belonging to the Brigham Young Academy. The company had expected to build the building to raise money for its completion, but owing to a cloud in the title, were unable to do so. Had the building been completed as contemplated, the First district court would have been located there. It is uncertain as to what will now be done with the building.

Alfred J. Devy and Sarah E. Marsh, of Alpine, were on Monday evening made man and wife by Bishop John E. Booth.

David E. Robertson and Rhoda E. Snell of Spanish Fork, have taken out a license signifying their intent to marry.

V. Junction, $20; Mepleton, $166; the total, $8,909.

Herry Boesherd arrived home from his German mission last night, looking well and feeling well. He has been gone about a year. He returned sooner than he had expected on account of the illness of his wife.

The fall of snow for this season of the year has been very heavy in Utah valley. There is now about a foot of snow on the ground, and it still falls.

The board of education held a session last night. Trustee Hardy reported that the Mountain school was in a very bad condition. The adobles were falling out of the wall, he said; the coal shed was broken and coal was disappearing; and to cap the climax, the school house was used in the evening by the big boys and girls for sparking. The committee on sites and buildings was instructed to look into the matter.

There is no unusual commotion on account of the school election. The non-partisan nominations of Friday evening will probably all be ratified.

Provo, Dec. 8.—The county court yesterday resolved to establish a poor farm. Selectman Holdaway was authorized to purchase the land and make other necessary arrangements.

Mr. Rob Irvine and Miss Dora Davis were united in the bonds of matrimony on Wednesday evening by Judge Dusenberry, at the residence of the bride's parents. The ceremony was witnessed by a select circle of relatives and friends. The presents were choice and appropriate. The groom is the son of Mr. R. R. Irvine of Irvine & Barney, and is universally respected. He has many friends in Salt Lake City, where he resided until within a couple of years, as well as in this city. Mrs. Irvine is especially noted for her sunny disposition and musical talent. Her circle of friends is large. We wish them joy and prosperity.

The second tail of the Young Men's Social Club is to be given at the Opera House on Friday evening.

Brown, trustee. The order appointed a committee to draft resolutions of respect in honor of Peter Monson, of Benjamin, a brother who recently died.

Marriage licenses have been issued to Edward A. Clark and Cecelia Oakly of Springville and James E. Snyder and Lelia Meacham of Provo.

Sick and indigent tramps are becoming numerous. One has made his appearance in Lehi with his feet frozen, and another applied to the county court yesterday for a railroad pass to get out of the country, which was granted him.

Alma Andrews, Salzenus Gardner and J. E. Wilkins of Spanish Fork were tendered receptions by their friends on Wednesday evening in honor of their departing for the United States to preach the gospel. They went to Salt Lake City yesterday.

We are having some bitter cold nights. The ice cuts will doubtless soon commence work.

OGDEN ITEMS.

Work on the Royal Alfred, one of the promising claims of the Ogden Canyon Mining & Milling company, will be resumed today.

The school election takes place today. Judge Leonard has issued an address calling upon every honest voter to stand by his agreement to shun politics in school matters.

Work at the gas wells is progressing with great rapidity and the derricks will soon be in place and ready for the machinery which is expected to arrive almost any day.

Henry Williams and Lou Turner "Sailor Kid," have signed an agreement for a fifty round contest to be fought Dec. 19. The place of fighting is not decided on.

Judge Miner has made no appointment to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Clerk McClure and may not do so for some time yet. It is almost assured that Keener S. Boreman will be appointed. Nearly every member of the bar has signed the petition in his favor.

Judge Miner has appointed Keener S. Boreman, clerk of the Fourth district court, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Charles H. McClure, the appointment to take effect on December 1st. The appointment was made as a result of a petition signed by almost every member of this bar.

J. H. Meyers, by his attorney, Abbott R. Hayward, commenced suit against the Ogden City board of education for $375.85. The case is the outcome of the financial troubles of John Hedderman, sub-contractor on the Grant avenue school building, which occupied so much of the time of the board some time ago.

In about two weeks Hoag Sling and Chan Pao Kwal, who left Ogden last week for San Francisco to attend some business matters in connection with the Chinese exhibit at the World's Fair, will sail for China for the purpose of superintending the shipment of materials and workmen necessary for the construction of the Chinese building.

Dan Maguire, chief of the mineral and archeological departments of the exhibit Utah will make at the World's Fair, returned home yesterday morning from Southern Utah, where he has been for two weeks collecting specimens. His trip was a most successful and interesting one, and an immense amount of beautiful specimens of mineral and archeological relics were gathered. Mr. Maguire will return to the extremely productive field this afternoon and be gone several days.

At the meeting of the board of education the teachers of the public schools asked that they be allowed their regular salaries during the Christmas holidays. The petition was laid upon the table. One hundred and seventy-three students petitioned for two weeks' vacation during the holidays. The petition met with the same fate. The schools will close on Friday, December 23rd, and resume their labors on Wednesday, January 4th, making a twelve-day vacation.

Deputy United States Marshal Gill will this morning bring J. P. Jones up from the penitentiary to plead before Judge Miner to an indictment charging him with adultery with Mrs. Minnie Trating, formerly of this city, but now living in Portland, Oregon. When being taken to Salt Lake on Monday night Jones broke down and sobbed like a child. He claims that his wife, who made the complaint that placed him behind the bars, was influenced by a certain real estate man against whom Mrs. Trating obtained a judgment in the district court on a real estate transaction.

Last Friday evening Messrs. R. W. Emmett and A. T. Watson, Superintendent Bancroft's chief clerk, went out on a shooting trip to Oaale, about 200 miles south of Ogden. On Sunday morning the hunters got lost in the desert, and from that time until 8 o'clock yesterday morning they had been wandering about through the snow. The horses were turned loose to find their way as best they could, while Messrs. Emmett and Watson, with the teamster whom they had employed, walked the desert over in an attempt to reach civilization. They reached Ogden on the D. & R. G. at 11 o'clock yesterday.

Within the next few days one of the biggest consignments of whalebone in its natural state ever sent across the continent will arrive in Ogden from San Francisco and be transferred to either the Union Pacific or the Rio Grande Western, or probably part to both roads, for New York, Paris and Bremen. The shipment is valued at $1,000,000 and is the property of the Pacific Steam Whaling company and came off the whaling bark, Beluga, Myer D. Hume, Agenor and America, which arrived in San Francisco last week. The bone is the teeth of the whale, and a fair-sized front molar is worth about $50. In every whale's jaw there are 475 teeth, and one good sized jaw is worth a deal of money.

The hearing in the damage suit for Oliver C. Myers vs. the Union Pacific occupied nearly the entire day in the Fourth District court yesterday, and will be resumed this morning. Myers claims $20,800 damages for a broken thigh, sustained near King Hill, Idaho, on the Oregon Short Line in December, 1890, by falling from the top of a car. At the time mentioned he was in the employ of the Union Pacific as freight brakeman, running west from Pocatello. When going up a heavy grade near King Hill the train on which the plaintiff was working broke in two, as he claims, and in order to save the rear section Myers, acting under instructions, climbed to the top of the car, without a ladder, and tried to set the brakes. Suddenly one of the chains which tightens the brakes broke and the brakeman was thrown to the ground, sustaining serious injuries.

John Bolognese, an Italian gardener, aged about sixty years, met with a terrible death on Twenty-fourth street, opposite Lester Park, yesterday morning. Shortly before the accident occurred the horse, which the deceased was driving, became frightened while being driven down Jefferson avenue and broke the shaft of the wagon to which he was attached. Bolognese repaired the broken shaft and proceeded down Twenty-fourth street, when the horse became frightened for a second time and again ran away. Bolognese held the animal by the reins and was walking behind him. He was dragged up against a tree, knocked down and two wheels of the wagon passed over the Italian's body. He was also badly cut about the head, the brains oozing out of one of the wounds. The horse was caught in the vicinity of the Rio Grande Western freight department. Passers by carried Bolognese into a neighboring butcher shop, where he died shortly afterwards. Surgeons were summoned to the scene but could do nothing to alleviate the sufferings of the unfortunate man. The deceased was a widower and has a son residing at Nampa, Idaho, who was notified of his father's sudden taking off. Larkin & Ben took charge of the remains and will await the arrival of the boy, when the remains will be disposed of. Bolognese was well known as an industrious man and a good citizen.

Sheriff Belpas returned yesterday from Honeyville, Box Elder county, bringing with him the horse, cart and harness taken from Graham's livery stable on Saturday last, which had been left at a farm near there late Saturday night by a meanly dressed and rather suspicious looking individual. The fellow made a pretense of going back to Honeyville, about two miles distance from the ranch, for his mail and never put in an appearance again. The sheriff left Ogden early Thursday morning and successfully traced the outfit. Nothing had been disturbed in the cart. A story comes from Malad, Idaho, which has some connection with the affair and if true casts some light upon the peculiar actions of the man who hired the rig at Graham's. On Monday morning a man giving his name as Thompson paid a hackman $15 for driving him over from Logan to Malad and an additional $10 for getting him there in good time. Thompson represented himself as an officer in search of an escaped convict named Dudley, sent to the penitentiary for eight years for cattle stealing. Upon arriving in Malad the self-styled deputy arrested a man whom he claimed to be Dudley and sent him back to Logan, he himself, leaving for the south. On Tuesday Thompson and a man whose description answers to that of the man who drove away in Graham's cart were seen in the vicinity of Malad being well mounted and leading a pack animal. They were making for the west. Thompson is a hard man and escaped from the penitentiary nearly two weeks ago. It is believed by the officers that his companion was Dudley, who is said to have escaped, the fact of which is being kept secret by the prison officials.

A FAILURE IN EDUCATION.

When one reviews the course of instruction in schools and colleges with the intention of discovering how much of it contributes directly to the development of reasoning power, one cannot but be struck with the very small portion of time expressly devoted to this all-important object. No amount of memorizer study of languages or of the natural sciences and no attainments in arithmetic will protect a man or woman—except imperfectly through a certain indirect cultivation of general intelligence—from succumbing to the first plausible delusion or sophism he or she may encounter. No amount of such studies will protect one from believing in astrology, or theosophy, or free silver, or strikes, or boycotts, or in the persecution of Jews or Mormons, or in the violent exclusion of non-union men from employment. One is fortified against the acceptance of unreasonable propositions only by skill in determining facts through observation and experience, by practice in comparing facts or groups of facts, and by the unvarying habit of questioning and verifying allegations, and of distinguishing between facts and inferences from facts, and between a true cause and an antecedent event. One must have direct training and practice in logical speech and writing before he can be quite safe against specious rhetoric and imaginative oratory. Many popular delusions are founded on the commonest of fallacies—this preceded that, therefore, his cause d that; or, in shorter phrase, what preceded caused. For example: I was sick; I took such and such a medicine and became well; therefore, the medicine cured me. During the Civil War the government issued many millions of paper money, and some men became very rich; therefore the way to make all men richer must be to issue from the government presses an indefinite amount of paper money. The wages of American workmen are higher than those of English in the same trades; protection has been the policy of the United States and approximate free trade the policy of England; therefore high tariffs cause high wages. Bessemer steel is much cheaper now than it was twenty years ago; therefore has been a tariff tax on Bessemer steel in the United States for the past twenty years; therefore the tax cheapened the steel. England, France and Germany are civilized and prosperous nations; they have enormous public debts; therefore a public debt is a public blessing. He must carry (thurs)spear and wear stout armor who can always expose and resist this fallacy. It is not only the uneducated or the little educated who are vanquished by it. There are many educated people who have little better protection against delusive and sophisms than the uneducated; for the employment that their education, though prolonged and elaborate, was still not of a kind to train their judgment and reasoning powers.

DEATH OF HON. S. S. FENN.

Hon. Stephen S. Fenn, ex-delegate to Congress from Idaho, died in the insane asylum at Blackfoot, yesterday, aged seventy-two years. He represented that state when a territory for two consecutive terms, beginning in 1875 and ending in 1879. He was not conspicuous for the qualities which make a great statesman, but he was a singularly brave, upright man with many warm friends and enemies and a goodly streak of hard sense and practical ability. He was always on the best of terms with Utah's delegate and was ever on hand to do anything for Utah. In politics he was a Democrat, though his son, who was speaker of the last house in the Idaho legislature, is a Republican. That his days should be spent in refuge for the insane will be as surprising as regretful to many who knew him.

The wire cable for the Yellow Jacket mine arrived at its destination last week, says the Sal. on City Recorder. It was taken in from Challis by the company's pack train and required twenty-four mules. It is estimated that it cost the company $1200 to convey this cable from Challis to the mine.

A WORD AS TO HEALTH.

Editor Deseret News: I am aware that you will not permit the use of your reading columns for the advertisement of any quack remedy or nostrum from which the inventors or manufacturers derive wealth through the impressions made upon the afflicted or the gullible; yet I believe you have an ardent desire to give publicity to anything that is calculated to lighten or prevent the ill of mortality. Hence I venture to say a word with reference to a treatment that is already well known to many of your readers, and comes recommended by endorsements of the highest character. I refer to the remedy explained in Dr. Hall's health pamphlet, alluded to and advocated further in the work edited by Dr. Hall himself, and published by Dr. Hall himself, and locally explained and sold by George Goddard of this city.

Those who are qualified to speak understandingly on the subject—I allude now to many leading and influential members of this community—declare the treatment is the very opposite of a medical humbug, that it dispenses with the use of drugs and poisons, that it deals naturally and philosophically with disease the germs of which may be latent in apparently the most healthy organism; and therefore that it devotes upon the press to play the part of benefactors by removing in this instance the prejudice with which the majority of mankind are now inclined to investigate remedies presented for popular acceptance.

Those to whom the treatment is revealed enter into a pledge not to divulge it; yet it would seem to be no great secret for you have doubtless read that it has been tried with eminent success in the cholera hospitals of Europe. This much is freely stated: it attacks and prevents disease in a manner such as no drug medication can attain, and depends for much of its initial popularity on the fact that it does away with the swallowing and the taking into the system of noxious poisons. To a community so opposed to excess of medicines as ours, this feature, I apprehend, will prove in the outset a strong commendation; and, judging by my own experience, and in the face of the testimonial evidence, I do not lightly lend the use of their means for such purposes, I cannot but entertain the belief that a great and highly efficacious system of health treatment has been played within reach.

ONE WHO HAS TRIED IT.

GOULD'S WILL

NEW YORK, Dec. 7.—An abstract of the will and codicils of the late Jay Gould was given to the press today by Judge Dillon, counsel for the executors and who stated that it was full and complete. Also that it had not been determined when or where it would be presented for probate.

The original will was dated Dec. 24, 1885. Gould on the 14th day of February, 1889, executed the first codicil, making such changes as became necessary by the death of his wife. The second and third codicils were executed on the 21st of November, 1892. Taking the will and codicils together the following accurate and full summary is made:

To his sister, Mrs. Northrop and daughter's the three lots in Camden N. J., on which they live, also a bequest to Mrs. Northrop of $25,000 and the further sum of $2,000 annually during her life. A similar bequest of $25,000 and an annuity of $2,000 is made to each of his sisters, Mrs. Anna G. Hugh and Mrs. Elizabeth G. Paten and to his brother William Gould.

To his daughter Helen M. Gould he gives the house in which he lived, 570 Fifth avenue, and all the contents.

To his son Edwin he gives in full, simple and absolute the house at No. 1 East Forty-seventh street with all the contents therein; to his daughter Helen he made a specific bequest of his portrait painted by Herkimer. He also gives to his daughter Helen, until the youngest child shall arrive at age, the use of his residence at Irvington, commonly called "Lyndhurst," free of taxes, and all the contents therein; and also the sum of $8000 per month, stating that this is to be in expectation that the minor children, Annie and Frank J., as well as his son Howard, will, during the period above provided for, make their home with Helen. To his name-ake and grandson, Jay Gould, son of George J. Gould, he gives the sum of $500,000 to be held in trust for said son by George J. Gould, with authority to apply the same to the support and education of said grandson, and pay one-fourth of the same to him at the age of twenty-five years, one-fourth at the age of thirty, and the remainder, half, at thirty-five, with power to pay the same at earlier periods at the discretion of his father.

To his son George J. Gould, he makes a bequest substantially in the following words:

"My beloved son, George J. Gould, having developed remarkable business ability, and having for the past five years taken entire charge of all my difficult interests, I hereby fix the value of his services at $5,000,000, payable as follows: $500,000 in cash, less the amount advanced by me for the purchase of a house for him on Fifth avenue, New York; $500,000 in Missouri Pacific 6 per cent mortgage bonds; $500,000 in St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway company consolidated 5 per cent bonds; $500,000 in Missouri Pacific railroad trust 5 per cent bonds; 10,000 shares of Western Union stock, and 10,000 shares of the Missouri Pacific stock, all to be taken and treated as worth par."

He appoints as executors and trustees of his will his sons George J. Gould, Edwin Gould and Howard Gould and Helen H. Gould, with provision that in case a vacancy shall happen by death or otherwise Frank J. Gould is to be an executor and trustee when he shall reach the age of twenty-one years, and in case of another vacancy he appoints his daughter Anna Gould to fill such vacancy when she shall reach the age of twenty-one years. No bonds are to be required of the executors and trustees. George J. Gould and Helen H. Gould are appointed guardians of Anna M. Gould and Frank J. Gould during their minority.

All the rest of the estate devised and bequeathed to said executors and trustees in trust, the first to divide the same into six equal parts or shares, and to hold and invest one of such shares for cash for each of the said children, George J. Gould, Edwin Gould, Howard Gould, Frank J. Gould, Helen M. Gould and Anna Gould, with the authority to collect and receive and apply the income thereof to each child for life, with power to each to dispose of the same by will in favor of their issue, and in case of death without issue the share of the one dying shall go to the surviving brothers and sisters and to the issue of the deceased child. He directs that no deduction shall be made by reason of any gifts or advancements heretofore made to, or for any of his children.

In case of difference of opinion among the executors and trustees, managing the estate, he directs that as long as there are five executors and trustees the decision of four shall be conclusive, and when four the decision of three shall be conclusive; with the further provision in the codicil of November 21, 1892, as follows:

"To better protect and conserve the values of my properties I direct and provide that shares of any railway or other incorporated companies, at any time held by my executors and trustees, shall always be voted by them or by proxies, at all corporate meetings as a unit. And in case my said executors and trustees do not concur as to how such stock shall be voted, then in view of the fact my son George J. Gould for years had the management of my said properties and familiar with them and with other like properties, I direct and provide in such event that his judgment shall control, and he is hereby authorized and empowered to vote said shares in person or by proxy in such manner as his judgment shall dictate."

There is a provision in the will that the property of his daughter is for their sole and separate use, free from any estate control of their husbands, and prohibiting all disposition of the same by any legal or by the way of anticipation or otherwise. There is a provision that if any of the children shall marry without the consent of the majority of the executors and trustees, the share allotted to such child shall be reduced one-half and the other half of such share shall be transferred to such persons as under the laws of the state of New York would take the same, as if the testator had died intestate.

A SNOW STORM.

OMAHA, Neb., Dec. 7.—Within a space of a hundred miles of Omaha last night the storm partook of the nature of a blizzard, although the temperature was moderate. For fourteen hours snow fell in driving clouds, carried along by a stiff gale from the north. Reports received here today indicate a general blockade. In the city traffic generally is suspended and electric street car lines are so thoroughly blocked that it will be at least two days before they run again. But few serious accidents are reported. The Burlington east-bound flyer collided with a light engine four miles west of South Omaha and both engines were badly wrecked. The engineer and fireman escaped injury, but William E. Booth, of Troy, N. Y., was stealing a ride on a mail car and had both legs so badly mangled as to necessitate amputation. He may die. The Chicago & Northwestern west-bound flyer was derailed near Council Bluffs and delayed several hours, but no one was injured. The storm has abated, but the temperature is falling.

THE STORM ABATES.

ST. JOE, Mo., Dec. 7.—Two trains from Denver on the Rock Island are snowbound, one at Phillipsburg, Kan., and the other at Holton, Kan. Grand Island reports one blocked train at Hanover. The Santa Fe reports traffic on the line not seriously impeded by the snowstorm in Kansas. The trains are late, however. Dispatches at midnight state that the storm has abated. NO CASUALTIES REPORTED IN KANSAS.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Dec. 7.—The first real blizzard of the winter in Kansas has been sweeping over the State for the past twenty-four hours. High winds have blown the snow into huge drifts in the northern part of the State, and all the railroads traversing that section are either completely blocked or suffering severely. As far as can be learned there has been no loss of life or beast by the storm.

ROOFS BLOWN OFF.

CAMDEN, Ark., Dec. 7.—A heavy windstorm last night blew off the roof of the public school building and a portion of the county court house was demolished. There was no loss of life. Many miles of fences were destroyed and numerous small buildings were blown down.

A TEXAS CYCLONE.

MARSHALL, Tex., Dec. 7.—A cyclone passed through the northwest portion of the county yesterday. The six-year-old daughter of Hank Whaley, colored, was killed and several other people were injured. Much damage was done to property.

RIEMS FROM MILLARD.

Millard county with her vast area and genial climate, owing to her limited water supply has been considered slow, but there are signs that warrant the prediction that she is going to "get there" all the same. Early settlements were only possible upon the small mountain streams on the east side of the county. Later several heroic efforts were made to dam the Beaver river, and plant the city of "Deseret," but time after time the treacherous quicksands in the river bed gave way, and the toil and hunger-planted dam went with the mighty stream, leaving scores of families without a prospect for bread, except as they scattered through the land among those who had not made the venture. This happened so often that the name of "Deseret" was whispered in derision of those who had once settled there. But undaunted men again went down to subdue the land, and with poverty and prayers they worked the woven willows in the water, checked the current, and waded their little farms, pointed with welcoming pride to their labors, and felt safe in what they had accomplished. But the insidious enemy was again at work, and would have again wrought ruin, had not friends and capital come to the rescue and scientifically put a substantial dam miles above the old location, necessitating an immense outlay of money and labor for canals and ditches, but giving security and future homes for thousands. Deseret with its neighboring settlements is there, and flourishing. We speak of them now with respect; they answer with a smile and hint at our absorptions. We laughed at first, but now we stop to consider, for the developments of the last three years have sobered us with facts. About that time one of our citizens was wading through the wastes in search of ducks; his practical eye perceived a future for the slumbering land, which have materialized in the investment of hundreds of thousands of dollars and the great future for the Swan Lake country about eleven miles southwest from Deseret.

I have just fished out a few facts about another project or enterprise of this same citizen. Again it is a reservoir and the irrigation of one hundred thousand acres of land, and we surpassed in fertility in all our Territory. The reservoir, a natural basin, will be four miles long by one mile wide, of great depth, fed by an enormous living spring, affording a stream thirteen feet wide and six feet deep, with a fall of six feet to the mile. There are three other streams that will be poured into the reservoir, for from six to eight months of the year. The outlet will be through a tunnel in solid rock, about seventy-five feet long. There will be no trouble from wave action, the lake being almost entirely surrounded by hills, filled with saw timber and fire wood of the best kind.

I have gathered these facts mostly from parties well acquainted with the country and have not found one doubter of the feasibility and success of this great enterprise. From my own knowledge the land is covered with black sage and amongst the best that ever responded to the toll of husbandman. It lays in the western part of our country. The father of these great schemes of development, is our respected citizen, Mr. Jos. E. Ray, not a grasping speculator, but an easy-going fellow who seems to glide through the world with great and practical ideas and willing that those who work with him shall share in these profits. He has already secured rights from land owners, and done work on the scheme. The small amount of capital necessary will easily be found.

Yes; Millard is surely "getting there" and "Joe" Ray's name will be written with honor in her history. A. BIRD.
FILLMORE, Dec. 6, 1892.

DR MAESER'S RETURN.

On last evening's Rio Grand Western train, says the Provo Evening Dispatch, of Wednesday, Provo's honored citizen and stalwart in the cause of education, Dr. Carl G. Maeser, returned to his home, having completed his first circuit in the interest of the Latter-day Saints' schools. The veteran is looking hale and hearty and feeling as well as he looks, for his trip has been a most pleasant and successful one, and with him when the cause of education is progressing in the land all else is well.

Dr. Maeser visited the two Church schools in Emery county, and the one in Utah, this Territory. He also visited the Church schools in the Snow Flake, Saint Joseph and Maricopa counties in Arizona. While at Mesquite in the last named county he met our old-time friend and fellow worker of the Garden City, Henry Rogers, who is feeling and doing exceedingly well and desirous of being remembered to his many friends here. Mr. Rogers is first Counselor to the President of that Stake of Zion.

Leaving Arizona the doctor entered Mexico, going as far south as Juarez in Chihuahua. He found the Mormon settlers and all others in excellent spirits with hopes renewed and buoyant, being assured of bounteous crops the coming season. For a long period of two or three seasons no rain had fallen in that country, and the great drought had caused much suffering. Just two days before Dr. Maeser arrived, the long wished for rains fell, flooding the whole district. Now the farmers are all plowing and sowing with great cheer. Added to this to make them more happy and cheerful is the fact that at last they have secured from the Mexicans permanent water rights, which will make them independent for all time to come.

Another great cause for rejoicing in that country is that the Indian scare is over, and the people again feel secure. Readers will remember the ravages and depredations by the renegade Indians there recently. These Indians had broken away from the reservation in Arizona. Upon hearing of the depredations the Mexican government sent troops of 500 men to protect the Mormon people and Helaman Pratt was appointed to act as guide for them and to locate them to the best possible advantage. Mr. Pratt was up in the mountains attending to his duties under this appointment when Dr. Maeser was there and as a consequence the two staunch and old time friends failed to meet. A most enjoyable and pleasing reception was tendered the doctor, however, by Mr. Pratt's family and it was highly appreciated by him. At Corralites he met the advance guard with captain and Mexican soldiers and was there informed that the troops would reach the invaded districts in a few days.

The people feeling safe, the bounteous rains, water rights secured, bright prospects for rich crops and beautiful springtime weather will go to make them happy, hopeful and thankful. When the doctor was there the flowers and trees were all in bloom and verdure everywhere. The first crop of lucerne will be cut in the first week in February and they will cut six crops. The first harvest will begin in May or June. In that country they have two harvests each year when the drought does not kill the crops.

While on the way the doctor noticed that the new railroad which will penetrate Mexico had reached six miles south of Deming. With this reaches the Mexican line the company which is a syndicate of English capitalists, will receive from the Mexican government $14,000 for every mile of road built. It is giving employment to the laborers there and will give Mexico a better market and means increased prosperity for the country.

At Pacheco, away up in the mountains fourteen miles south of Juarez, Moses Thatcher and Heber J. Grant own and have in operation a modern and fully equipped saw mill and are supplying the people of the surrounding country with timber and lumber of the best quality and at very low prices, and as a result of this enterprise the development of the country is being considerably hastened.

While in Mexico the doctor established three Church schools in Colonia Diaz, Dublin and Colonia Juarez in Chihuahua, and while on the return trip he attended Latter-day Saints' worship at Oakland and San Francisco, California. He found much interest in the cause of religion manifested by the people there, also all of the Saints in Mexico happy and enthusiastic and the schools flourishing and progressing far beyond his expectations, and taken altogether the doctor has occasion to feel well over his successful and pleasant trip.

Ernest Hart has been arrested at Durango, Colo., for an alleged murder of a citizen of Albuquerque a year or two ago.

AN OLD AFFLICTION.

The following communication, reminiscence of twenty years ago, affords proof that the "short weight coal" is by no means a new disease in this locality. The letter is taken from the back files of this paper:

SALT LAKE CITY March 6, 1873.

Editor Deseret Evening News:

I have seen several allusions in your paper at different times to the necessity that exists for public weighing scales and an ordinance to regulate the operations of the same, and it is a matter of surprise, not only to myself but to many others, that the suggestion has not long since been acted upon. Circumstances of daily occurrence point to the absolute necessity for public weighing scales. It is neither my design nor my desire to make any charge against coal dealers as a class, believing, as I do, that, as a body, they are as honest as the rest of mankind. But mistakes are apt to occur in other institutions besides families, and that they frequently creep into the question of how many hundred weight of coal it takes to constitute a ton of the article is too frequently demonstrated to admit of denial. There is a certain peculiarity, too, in connection with mistakes of this nature—they are almost invariably one-sided.

I could cite a number of instances if it were deemed advisable to do so, but in writing this note I take to constitute a ton the role either of an accuser or dictator, but rather to stand in the position of a suggester. It does not make a person feel in a very good humor, however, when, after ascertaining that he was receiving short weight of fuel all winter, he should take the trouble of satisfying himself by having a supposed ton of coal weighed, and find it to be nearly one-sixth short of weight, especially when that individual had been using a very large amount of coal during the cold season; yet such things would occur.

Errors of this kind would probably be avoided by the establishment, at or near the railroad depot, by the city, of public weighing scales, and the passage of an ordinance requiring coal dealers to have their loads weighed, and that they should present to the purchaser a certificate of weight received at those scales. The consumption of coal is becoming, and is even now extensive enough, I should think, to enable the city, by charging a small amount for each load weighed, to conduct an affair of this kind without any expense, and I am of opinion that the outlay incurred by its first establishment would soon be refunded. I do not doubt that all respectable coal dealers would be glad to see the establishment of public weighing scales, as it would be the means of securing and maintaining confidence between themselves and the public. SUGGESTER.

NOTES.

It is noticeable that since the campaign closed there is a great demand for remedies for the "lumpy jaw."

"As THE governor of Wyoming said to the other governor of Wyoming," is the revised expression.

WILL THE Wyoming Barber say "Your turn next" when he lets Mr. Osborne know that the latter can have the gubernatorial chair?

WHAT is usually spoken of as "a good working majority" in a legislative body is too frequently a majority that will not work at all.

IF THE rain making experiment had been tried in this vicinity last Saturday what a feather in its cap this snowstorm would have been!

ITEMS FROM PAYSON.

On Saturday evening last John J. McClellan, Jr., returned to his home from a seventeen months' absence from Payson. He has been in Hagtown, Mich., studying music (piano, pipe organ and composition) and has been favored with success and returns home happy to meet old friends.

The snow has visited Payson and vicinity and we are surrounded by the "beautiful." The weather is cold, except when the sun shines upon us in all its splendor.

On the night of December 24th Mr. McClellan, assisted by the noted Payson champion silver band, the elite orchestra and the combined choirs of the city also with the aid of Prof. Hy. Brimhall, the Misses Thatcher and Wright, Prof. George H. Done and others will give a musical festival in the Payson Opera House. It goes without saying that Mr. McClellan will be greeted with a full house and above all an appreciative audience.

The combined choruses of the city will meet next Tuesday evening in the vestry, and will practice several splendid choruses. Among them is "God of Israel," by Rossini. Prof. Brimhall is conducting the choruses.

THE SCHOOL ELECTION.

As chronicled in these columns last evening, the vote of yesterday's election in this city was an exceedingly light one. In the First precinct alone was there any rivalry or more than ordinary interest.

Second (Nelson).....	210
Third (Beattie).....	151
Fourth (Young).....	94
Fifth (Doody).....	135

Y. L. M. I. A. CONFERENCE.

The conference of the Young Ladies' Mutual Improvement associations of this State was held on the 6th of December in the Assembly Hall. While the state of the weather prevented many from the country associations from attending, there was a fair congregation at 2 p. m. when President Mary A. Freeze called the meeting to order. After the usual opening exercises Mrs. Susie Young Gates made an address—"The Duties of Children to Parents." She thought no child could become a truly good child from a sense of duty alone—there must be an abiding love to make a true, generous heart. Thought it necessary and very important for our young to find out their spiritual parents and to love them, that they may not pray from a sense of duty alone but from true love.

Mrs. Minnie Snow made some remarks on the value of time, which she said was a gift of God which should be highly valued. She did not favor education in one channel at the expense of all others; it should develop all those qualities that make us truly great, in other words to cultivate the heart. A well-known writer—Ruskin—has said we should have a mirror for the heart as well as the face.

Miss Louise Poulton then favored the audience with a sacred solo.

Ter. Pres. E. S. Taylor felt impressed to refer to the subject of marriage. She so regretted to see the flippant manner with which this most holy relation is regarded by the young in this age. The Lord says, "I hate putting away" and assigns but one cause for divorce. The marriage relation brings joy and happiness in the extreme, or loathing and misery. She urged the young ladies to reflect upon the seriousness of this step before taking it, to seek unto the Lord for guidance in choosing a companion for time and eternity.

Dr. Maggie C. Shipp, Mrs. M. Y. Dougal and Mrs. Mary H. Freeze followed touching upon the same subjects with interest and benefit to those present.

Meeting then adjourned until 7:30 p. m.

At the evening session Pres. Freeze referred to the Young Ladies Journal and said it was published for the benefit of the young ladies. It has not yet paid expenses and she hoped the president of the associations would encourage its circulation.

Other speakers during the evening were Mrs. M. B. Talmage, Mrs. Mattie H. Tingey, Mrs. Nellie C. Taylor, Mrs. Mary C. McKay and Miss Edith Sansome. A duet was beautifully rendered by Mrs. Annie Murphy and Miss Jane McKay.

Conference was then adjourned for three months.

Benediction.

LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

From a personal correspondence to President Angus M. Cannon from Bishop Alfred Solomon of this city, dated Cheltenham, England, Nov. 17, 1892, the following extracts will be perused with interest by the readers of the News.

After referring in terms of tender sympathy to the recent death in the missionary field of Elder David Hoagland Cannon, the writer says:

Death has been getting in his work among the missionaries lately. The Saints in England are getting quite concerned. When they see so many of the Elders are called home, and so few coming to fill their places, they begin to feel as if they were to be left alone. I tell them it will be quite a while yet before they will be left alone, and that if they will be faithful in the performance of their duties the Lord will not forsake them.

The prospects here in England for the workmen are very discouraging, the writer says. Business of all kinds seems to be going down. Go where you will, you can see hundreds of unemployed men standing around. Grain is coming in from foreign countries so cheap that the farmers cannot begin to raise it and pay the rents demanded. It has an ominous outlook.

I was up to London a few weeks ago to the conference in company with Elder Seymour B. Young, Jr. One day we went to the Tower of London. Just before going into the Tower, we saw a number of men gathered on Tower Hill, a place where a great many meetings are held. These men unfurled a red flag with writing on it, calling on the unemployed workmen to demand their rights, which they hung on the wall. After visiting the Tower, we saw, on coming out again, that a large crowd had gathered. A man was speaking, telling his hearers that today there were 80,000 unemployed workmen in London, which meant 250,000 men, women and children standing in need. He said there were 30,000,000 acres of land in England, kept to preserve game for the nobility to shoot at. This, he said, would raise wheat enough for bread to those who stood in need. They were also paying taxes, he said, for themselves to gamble with and live in luxury at the workmen's expense.

Such talk would naturally excite these men, but there was a large force of policemen standing around, and there is also quite a number of soldiers stationed in the Tower. It is said, however, that the officers are suspicious of the troops, fearing that, if anything should occur, the men would join the rioters. It is plainly seen that fear is taking hold of the inhabitants of the earth.

In regard to missionary labor in England, Bishop Solomon says it is pretty much up hill work. The Elders go out in the different counties in the summer and distribute thousands of tracts and hold numerous outdoor meetings. The visible results, however, are very small. As soon as a person manifests any interest in the principles of the Gospel the ministers get word and the matter seems to be at an end. People are hardly brave enough to embrace the Gospel, and those who do are mostly friends or relatives to some one already belonging to the Church. Our missionaries cannot as a rule rely on the hospitality of the people whom they visit. They have to find their own board and lodging and furnish the tracts they distribute, besides.

As an instance of the reception the Elders sometimes meet with when endeavoring to perform their duties, the following incident is related. One of the brethren one day had to go up a drive to a fine mansion. He saw the gentleman of the house sitting at the window, reading. The missionary politely knocked at the door and handed the servant girl a tract. As he started down the drive he heard a loud noise, and looking around saw the so-called gentleman setting his dog on him, which, according to the Elder's impression, looked like a lion in size. He felt his hair coming on end, but as the dog came near he too clapped his hands and shouted, and the animal passed him.

I feel proud sometimes when I see the earnestness and zeal manifested by our young Elders in trying to spread the Gospel among the children of men. Surely, light has come into the world, but the world will not receive it. Their deeds are so evil, that the Gospel cannot make any impression on them. It is quite a trial of the patience of some of the brethren in standing before the people in open air meetings, and distributing tracts. They are denounced as fools, and indignities are heaped upon them. Yet they try to be perfect gentlemen. It makes me think of the saying of President Young a great many years ago. Some one said to him, What is the use of sending Dr. Bernhisel to Washington? He is too easy and non-combative. "No," President Young replied, "that is just the reason we want him there. He can sit in the House and listen to more abuse of the Mormons than any man we have got, and never say a word. He is a perfect gentleman, nail of it."

DANGER OF DRAUGHTS.

It is strange the difference there is in people about sitting in a draught of air. Some people can sit or lie in a draught and not suffer the least inconvenience, while others would catch their death of cold in a few minutes, says the Home-Maker. Why is this? It cannot be wholly due to the relative strength of the individual, nor solely to the conditions of particular organs of the body. Judging from observations it would seem that, other things being equal, those who have the best capillary circulation are the ones least likely to suffer. But this again depends upon certain other conditions. A person who has a very feeble pulse, showing low vitality, cannot have good circulation in the capillaries; the surface is easily chilled, hence the danger of taking cold.

But you will see another individual with a strong pulse, good vitality, who is apparently as susceptible to draughts as the one who is feeble. The cutaneous circulation is sluggish, owing to abnormal conditions. It may be due to an error in diet or something which interferes with the surface circulation. One who lives largely on oily foods may have a skin so torpid that the capillaries in it cannot do their work properly; or, if there is an excess of bile in the blood, this fluid may be so thick that the fine network of capillaries cannot carry it. The surface circulation will be sluggish and the skin easily chilled.—Chicago News Record.

THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF IT.

The facetiousness displayed by some of our contemporaries in dealing with the subject of Mr. Lease's senatorial aspirations is puerile in some cases, indifferently humorous in others and quite funny in a few. The fact is, the question has never before been brought seriously to the people's attention, and they were consequently unprepared for it; it was thought, and in a good many cases hoped, that with the exercise of suffrage the women of the land would be satisfied, but it seems that they or some of them are beginning to understand, if they have not all along done so, that the right to hold office is a corollary of the right to vote and they might as well "pull" for the whole figure while they are about it.

One of the papers published in a community where probably the people are easily satisfied, and one or two evidently located where some sort of reasoning has to be resorted to, have been seriously considering the constitutionality of the case, and arrived at conclusions in each instance that Mrs. Lease cannot go to the Senate. To demonstrate this they appeal to the Constitution itself, which, referring to the qualifications of a senator, says "he" must be thus and so, the deduction being announced with as much use of a flourish of trumpets as mule and pulpitless typists capable of that if the great charter had meant or intended to include "she" it would have said so, the same being so easily said. This is, perhaps, as funny as anything that has yet been printed, and that, too, without intending to be so.

If the gentlemen of the fraternity would only go a little further in their legal researches and read up on the statutes or even the ordinances of their respective localities, we guarantee that they would find here and there a section forbidding the commission of certain acts, the penalty for violation being that "he" shall be fined, or "he" shall be imprisoned, or both; and if the offender happened to be a "she" would they make that a plea in her behalf? Hardly. Paying taxes and suffering punishment for the violation of legal enactments are two of the privileges common to mankind from which womenkind are not debarred; and the mere absence of "she" from the Constitution could scarcely be considered as of much consequence in figuring on Mrs. Lease's chances for a seat in the Senate.

But there is better authority than comparison and precedent. If our journalistic friends will take up their evidently neglected Pinneo or Murray (of course they have them) or turn to the chapter on gender, they will there be informed that the masculine is the common wherever necessary, so that the words "he," "him" and "his" embrace and include "she," "her" and "hers." If the subject requires it; this is not only a grammatical rule but a very convenient one, in that it avoids redundancy and makes it unnecessary to be wearily specific.

We do not think there is anything in the Constitution, or out of it except death, sickness or the Kansas legislature, that can keep Mrs. Lease away from the upper house of the national legislature as a member thereof; and yet we are not prepared to believe that she will ever look upon the interior of that place unless it be as a spectator.

A SLIGHT CORRECTION.

A cotemporary with an eye to the spillo heads its list of local offices to be vacated under the new administration with the following:

Governor—Present incumbent, Arthur L. Thomas; term expires May, 1893; salary, $2,600, with $1,000 for incidental expenses.

Territorial Secretary—Present incumbent, Elijah Sells; term expires May, 1893; salary, $1,800, with $300 additional as disbursing officer of the Utah Commission, and fees.

In these matters it is just as well to be accurate, and the foregoing does not meet that requirement. Governor Thomas' term does not expire until December 30, 1893; and Secretary Sells' term not only does not expire until the same date as the Governor's, but his compensation, in addition to salary $1,800, with $300 additional as disbursing officer of the Utah Commission and fees, includes a comfortable item of $1,500 for incidental expenses. Democratic friends who may have set their hearts upon the place will doubtless thank the News for the latter amendment to the statement from which we quote, even though they may be compelled, if tenure of office be permitted, to wait a few months longer before coming to the enjoyment of it.

A NEEDED REFORM.

We take off our hat, metaphorically, to the management of the Tremont theater, Boston, who are in the field with a pointed request asking the lady patrons of that house to take off theirs, literally. A copy of the programme for a recent evening contained in bold and displayed advertising type the following:

To the Lady Patrons of this Theater.

Will you aid the management in its work of hat reform?

Wear a small bonnet or remove your large hat during the performance.

The theater is well heated and protected from draughts.

Respectfully and gratefully,
ABNEY, SCHORFFEL & GRAU.

A similar reform cannot be introduced in the Salt Lake theater a moment too soon. The ladies have but one reason to object, so far as can be learned, and that is that the conveniences for leaving their headgear in the cloakrooms are inadequate. But if this is insurmountable to them, why is it not to the sterner sex also? No one would think of justifying a man in wearing his hat during a performance by an excuse so childish; with one voice the audience would say that rather than destroy the enjoyment of those who were compelled to sit near him, any gentleman would hold his hat in his lap or even carry it in his hand during the whole evening. Why should not a lady be equally thoughtful of others' convenience, especially as she can with so much more ease sufficiently clothe her head while going to and from the building and bare it during the play? All that is needed is for the true ladies to set the example by wearing low hats or removing them altogether, and thus make it fashionable to be considerate of the comfort of their neighbors.

LESSON FOR DISHONEST BUILDERS.

On the third of April, 1885, a row of five-story brick tenement buildings in New York collapsed without the slightest warning, one man being killed and twenty or more variously injured. The houses were built by Charles A. Buddenleik and in order to save as much as possible he used mud instead of mortar, with the result stated. For this he was tried, convicted and sentenced to imprisonment in Sing Sing for a period of ten years and to pay a fine of $500. He was an exemplary prisoner and gained three years and seven months commutation thereby; his release took place on Friday last, and the fine was remitted.

The penalty imposed upon Buddenleik was none too severe, but perhaps all the ends and aims of the law had been accomplished in his case, and it is simply savagery to go beyond that. The object, so far as the public were concerned, was not revenge or any feeling of like character, but to give a lesson so severe that all others would take warning, and it is believed that this has been effectual. Certainly if there are any more such buildings they have not of late developed the fact by crumbling.

There are Buddenleiks everywhere and it is the duty of all good people to be on the lookout for them. Those men who for mere gain will jeopardize the lives of their fellows in the manner spoken of are no better than others who accomplish destruction by differing methods, and it is ever so much better that they be apprehended and their work stopped before a life is lost.

GARNER'S INTERESTING EXPEDITION

Some time since the scientific world was given a new subject to speculate upon in the departure of Prof. R. L. Garner for the interior of Africa, having in view a thorough study of the characteristics of the animal nearest to man in points of similarity physically considered, if not in intelligence—the monkey. The inevitable paragraphic designation of the professor's projected labors was duly forthcoming and they were termed a "monkey's academy in Africa." The feature more conspicuous than any other in the courageous man's project was, if possible, to throw light upon the question, "Do monkeys talk, and can a human being learn their language or teach them his?" If he shall be able to carry this out, we will all be able to agree with a cotemporary that he will furnish one of the most important contributions that have been made to our knowledge of man acquired by study of the creatures who are below the human race in racial development. He has, it is shown; a definite and comprehensive idea of the range of exploration in regard to animals which can be brought within his reach, and he has provided seemingly for every emergency that may arise. He has applied nearly all the latest achievements of science, within the scope of his plans, to the advancement of his expedition. He will use the electric battery and the electric lighting, as well as the camera and the phonograph; and the telephone to increase his opportunities to see things to advantage, and he will even apply electricity for the purpose of placing animals within his reach. In the meantime he will be provided with a cage in which he can insulate himself and protect his property in an emergency, an invention which is declared worthy of a born New Englander, and all his arrangements show that whatever the African forests have to furnish us in the way of information upon the animal world and the connection of human with animal speech, will be within the scope of his inventive genius and personal energy. "Never before," says the Boston Herald, "has a man proposed to bury himself in the wilds of Africa to the same extent with so intelligent a scientific purpose or with so adequate an equipment for carrying out his plans. He seems to have anticipated everything that was needed, and his plan is so novel and interesting that the results of his expedition will be eagerly awaited."

It should be remembered that Prof. Garner is in a part of the world where communication with another part of it is utterly out of the question most of the time if not all of it; so that, whether his expedition will be crowned with a successful outcome and something concerning our "next of kin" of which we are at present in ignorance be imparted to the human family, or the reverse, we will not be likely to know until he returns. Then we will know it all at once, in one lesson so to speak.

SPECULATING ON THE UNKNOWNABLE

Professor Hall, of the naval observatory at Washington, is said to be unable to account for the sudden development of popular interest in the subject of the planet Mars and the beings who are presumed to inhabit it. [The New York World seeks to make an explanation in the fact that a good many people believe there is a possible connection between the comet and the planet named. We have all heard of the belief entertained and expressed by some of the earth's scientific men that the inhabitants of Mars, or some of them, have for years been endeavoring to arrest our attention and establish sympathetic if not intelligible communication between the two planetary neighbors; and we are now advised of the thought entertained by many that, "falling to attract the attention of the inhabitants of the earth by means of the elaborate system of signals hung out last summer, the highly cultivated canal-digging residents of the red planet may have fired off the comet as a parting shot. However this may be, the fact remains that the opposition of Mars had been going on for several months without attracting any attention until the World's astronomer pointed out the mystery surrounding its three lights and other seeming signals, as seen through the Lick telescope."

There are some things which the olden knows as well as the sage, some effects the cause of which are no less a sealed book to the devotee of science than to the "mind uncorrupted by books;" one of these subjects is what a comet (especially the alleged one now in or near the solar system) is, what it is for and from whence it came. That they are interstellar wanderers is understood; but whether they are fragments of some far-away factor in the celestial economy or whether they are aggregations of meteoric matter replenished in their own glow or are opaque and like our moon borrow their brilliancy from the sun, we know not and may never know. What the use, what the purpose of a comet is a mystery; but to say that it has no purpose is to cast a reflection upon infinity.

ANCIENT ROME REDIVIVUS.

The spectacle that was presented at the Coney Island Athletic club last night was one to make considerate men think for a time that the wheels of civilization have been turned back a few hundred years and we are again face to face with the gladiatorial arena which filled the savage-souled Romans with delight. In the name of "sport" a few thousand men assembled at that well-known resort and pay exorbitant prices for the privilege of witnessing one of the bloodiest, most brutal and blackguard exhibitions of modern times, and the law not only does not interfere with the disgusting business but actually licenses it. The sensation imparted by reading the details is emphasized by the announcement that the "smell of warm, fresh blood" at the end of the first round set the audience wild with delight—just as it used to the patriarchs who witnessed the struggle between the gladiators in the Roman amphitheatre and who could scarcely contain themselves when at last one of the combatants, drunk with wounds, staggered and fell to the gory ground to rise no more. Truly, there be comes to stir a cultivated man to his depths! And the fact that the smell of human blood has still the old-time stimulation for those whose where such effluvia and the cause of it are abundant, that they do not turn from it in dismay but linger for more and howl with delight over the brutal business, does but show that the advancement we have made is after all, in the absence of restraint, the merest fiction. Given the same opportunities that the ancients had, and how long would it be before we would be reading notices of "fights to a finish" in which one or both of the contestants were slaughtered in the ring and expired in a pool of blood! As a matter of fact, men have quite frequently been killed in prize fights, yet—perhaps as another evidence that we are retrograding—the punishment is always very light where any is inflicted at all, which is not every time the offense occurs by any means.

Against boxing with gloves as a scientific and athletic pastime, when engaged in with moderation and without ill-feeling, there is nothing to be said; even exhibitions in which such contests are a feature need not be objectionable on that account. But when gloves are used simply because the wording of the law is such that the contestants will not be allowed to combat without them, and they are made so hard and so light that they are even worse than the bare fists, the law is not only set aside but made a nooker; and when to this is added an utter disregard for skill and each goes in to wear the other out in a hurry by means of brute force, pounding, hammering, battering and punching, it is time to call a halt on the whole business. Given a certain latitude, the pugilistic fraternity have taken all they ever had before and more too, certainly all in the way of brutality and ferocity that the most savage disposition in any age could demand; and such was the fight as described in New York last night.

The disposition in mankind, or a portion of it, to evade prescribed regulations and go back to forbidden customs and thus cultivate anew the merely animal instincts which have been held in repression by force and moral sanction united for half a thousand years, is now so manifest that the authorities will be justified in putting an end to boxing exhibitions altogether. Those who delight in barbaric pastimes had better be controlled while yet they are controllable.

THE PARKHURST SENSATION.

There is a fight on in New York city between Rev. Dr. Parkhurst and Police Superintendent Byrnes, and, to use the somewhat hackneyed words of Sir Lucius O'Trigger, "it's a very pretty quarrel as it stands." The doctor is the pastor of a fashionable church in Gotham and also president of the society for the suppression of vice; in this latter capacity he has been making the rounds of the dens, dives and resorts of the metropolis, dragging dark and forbidden deeds from their recesses and exposing them to the light of the noonday sun. He is perhaps animated by the purpose of curtailing if he cannot suppress, and understands that "showing up" is a means of repression, if not of reform, as effective as any that can be employed. Particularly among the fallen women, to enumerate whom in New York would require a great row of figures, has the doctor been laboring; and if none of them have turned away from their loathsome vocation, it has not been for want of such reformatory incentive as exposure may produce.

The chief of the constabulary now shows that he can wield a pen as well as a louset, and he comes back at the doctor in a trenchant and incisive manner for some of the latter's reflections upon him and his administration of police powers. He thinks Rev. Parkhurst ought to know by this time how uncharitable the world is to that class of women, as well as he does not know the lesson of the Master when dealing with the adulteress. And then he wants to know how many such creatures the preacher or his society have taken from the street, and given shelter to; he claims that it is an evil that cannot be suppressed and must not be licensed, therefore the middle ground of compromise must be taken, that is, it must be hidden from view where it will not corrupt the morals of the growing youth. This the police are doing to the best of their ability, as he claims. As to the gambling evil, the superintendent says somewhat scoffingly that when preaching and praying will make men good, then gambling will stop; and he concludes with a severe arraignment of the doctor for his methods in spotting and spying by means of agents and informers, some of whom Byrnes declares are "as great a set of soundreils as ever misled a reputable man into slandering the fair name of the city where he makes his home." This might be termed the climax of rhetorical indignation.

Thus the matter stands at latest advice. If the police power and authority has been exerted to the utmost in the repression of the social evils of New York as claimed, nothing more should be looked for from that source and the superintendent is justified in coming to the defense of his department. If Dr. Parkhurst and his society have, by the means employed, induced even one sinner to repent and turn from his ways, they have done so much good and are entitled to the credit of it. There seems a considerable degree of sensationalism—a desire to be conspicuous through the work done and the manner in which it is done, that thereby popularity if not prosperity may be gained. The question as to the plan adopted per se is a two-sided one; if good its fruits will so proclaim it; but it is greatly to be feared that at least some of the possible good may be neutralized by the probable harm of creating a prurient feeling through the exposures where none was felt before—of familiarizing the public, by association, with practices and people previously unnoticed if not unknown. Let us, however, hope for the best; out of the turbulence engendered by exposure on one side and denunciation on the other there may come an improved condition of things—something which both sides to the controversy are now bound to invite and make welcome.

A HINT FOR WOULD-BE SENATORS.

Senator Kyle, of South Dakota, who, by the way, is a preacher as well as a politician, did not blossom out in the latter role until he went to Dakota, and only then after the Farmers' Alliance movement came into prominence. He was elected to the United States Senate after a contest of forty days, and was chosen as an independent, though on the tariff and other issues between the two great parties he votes with the Democrats. He is spoken of as a good campaigner and a hard worker; and that he knows a thing or two about electioneering methods was proved when, as a candidate for state senator, he made a house to house canvass through his very large district. This tour was made at a season when the farmers were busy in their fields—too busy in fact to talk politics. So it is related that he took with him a stout, lusty negro and then went right into the fields after his votes. Introducing himself to the busy tiller of the soil, and engaging the latter at a moment in the day when he would have the negro take the plow and continue the field work, while candidate and farmer would go off under a tree and talk things over. The sweating husbandman was of course won by this thoughtful regard for himself and his interests, and Kyle got his pay in votes.

THE COLLEGE YOUTH.

EVERY few weeks during the autumn and early winter the wires delivered a message of some mad prank or outbreak of vandalism on the part of the lusty, brawny boys who make up the population of the prominent eastern universities. Some times these exhibitions are confined in their effects to the different classes of the same or of rival institutions, in which case the victims are entitled to no sympathy, since their voluntary participation involves the chance of their being worsted. But more frequently it transpires that the enrolled and presumably educated gang carry their riotous behavior outside their own campus and seek sufferers from it in the ordinary avenues of life and among a less favored class of mankind. Thus, for instance, we read in a New Haven paper of the 31 that the night previous the Yale freshmen carried their celebration to such an extreme that they virtually broke up a play in the opera house; they broke into a dime museum and played havoc with the proprietor's chattels; they tried unsuccessfully to effect an entrance into the fair, but were repulsed by a party of doorkeepers who, armed with clubs and base ball bats, drove them back, one of the students receiving a wound on the neck by the blow of a shovel; a restaurant was next visited by the rowdies, who overturned all the furniture and compelled a young woman to stand on a table and make a speech; en masse the freshmen then repaired to the campus and indulged in a rush with the sophomores; the celebration concluded by the freshmen breaking a number of windows in the "old brick row." The jolly escapade being thus appropriately terminated so far as the gilded youth were concerned, the timorous law stepped in to the extent of causing the arrest of four of the party! And this terrible punishment was to be supplemented, so the same paper informs us, by an investigation of the matter by the college faculty, the result of which, it was believed, would be a number of expulsions!

It seems to take a long time for the authorities of some of those towns and colleges to know when they have got enough of this sort of rowdism. The mistake is in looking charitably at it as nothing worse than a rough display of youthful enthusiasm where mischief and not willful injury to person or property is the motive. Because, forsooth, the big-boned hoodlums are fortunate enough to be able to attend college, there appears to be a mortal fear of repressing their buoyancy of spirits, approaching in some instances a feeling of beatific martyrdom in being made the victim of their jokes. Such imbecility is difficult to understand in this part of the country or any other where the law has any meaning and can be impartially administered. An offender against the city's peace and good order is none the less so because he may figuratively wear a mortar-board and gown. If he is a brawler and a destroyer of any citizen's peace or property he deserves punishment as much as the friendless tramp who engages in a like diversion.

The trouble doubtless arises from the almost insane devotion paid to athletic sports and achievements in all the leading institutions of learning. Where the stroke oar of the winning varsity crew or the strong limbed fellow who can unerringly kick a goal for his football team is of more consequence and obtains greater praise than the head man in the graduating class, it is idle to expect that a physical culture, even though wearing all the attributes of a riot, will be sincerely condemned. Yet the evil is not without its imminent cure; when it is finally carried to excess, a point that cannot be far in the future, a sensible community, duly mindful of the need of adequate bodily exercise to cool off the exuberant ardor of its pampered scions, will gradually come to look with a favorable eye upon the efficacy of the bread-and-water diet and the chill seclusion of a prison cell, enhanced by occasional enlivening experience with a treadmill or with a stonehammer on the public highway.

OFFICIAL SUCCESSION ONCE MORE.

The News regrets to see a disposition on the part of some of its contemporaries now and then to avoid a manly confess of error when they know they have made a mistake; they evidently think it more dignified to seek to crawl out of the position falsely taken, or to cover their enforced retreat by hurling slurs and insinuations, than to acknowledge the error and strive after great accuracy in the future.

A case in point is before us. Yesterday we showed that a contemporary, with an eye to the soils, made a mistake of several months in the date given for the expiration of the term of office of the present Governor and Secretary of this Territory. This morning the same contemporary declares that "Governor Thomas takes exceptions to the statement that his term of office would expire in May, 1893, and places the date in December. The Governor was appointed to and took possession of his office in May, 1889. Whether the official term dates from accession to office or confirmation by the Senate or the department records, is a question not finally determined. But all this cuts no figure." Whereupon the paper concludes to "stand by its original statement, even to go on one better and say that his excellency's term will expire before May, 1893."

Now, it happens that it was not the Governor, but the Secretary, who took

"exceptions to the statement," and signified as much in a respectful way to the editor of the paper referred to. His letter was as follows:

Your reporter called at my office yesterday to ask when the official term of the Governor and Secretary would expire. He was informed that the date fixed in their commissions from the President was Dec. 30, 1893. I now read for your issue of today that the information given was changed to read "May, 1893." Will you be kind enough to make the correction?

ELIJAH SELLS.

The reader will see from the first quotation above how the editor aforesaid showed that he was "kind enough to make the correction." The News has no interest in the offices or in the present or future incumbents of them. But it does like to see the proprieties observed.

BY WAY OF CONTRAST.

Under the heading "Mission Work for Mountain Whites," the Christian Union of recent date publishes an article, which, taking the first paragraph reproduced below for its text, comments upon it in the paragraphs that follow:

"Along the Appalachian mountains from Virginia to Alabama are two millions of people, two-thirds of whom have never received a letter or written one, and could not read one if it were printed and sent to them; a people who take no newspapers, read no books, who live in log huts, and know nothing of the great world around them."

"Civilization has spread around them on all sides, but never reached them. Their houses today are made of logs, plastered with mud; there is but one room inside; the bare earth is the floor, and no windows admit light. In this dark and dismal room a family of ten or twelve persons will be found living, with not so much as a partition of any kind to separate the men from the women and children."

In recent years the discovery of iron and coal and the opening up of timber lands has brought these people to light, and they now look out from their mountain homes with astonished eyes as they see the steam saw-mill invading their hunting grounds, and the locomotive pushing its way up the valleys. Their children, with sad little faces born of want and privation, crowd to the mission schools as the greatest boon of their lives. Girls with a single ragged garment on will walk twenty or thirty miles through the forests to reach a school, and beg to be taken in, for they have heard of a life there which has kindled a spark of hope in their sad and darkened existence. "The life of a mountain girl is now a life of sin and sorrow. Born to vice and sorrow from the first breath she draws, she is taught, 'Lucky if married off at twelve or fourteen years of age,' and then comes a life of drudgery. She toils from morning to night, indoors with her babies, outdoors with the men. If she likes to see her children grown, they will treat her as a slave; her own sons will order her out into the fields to work, and leave her to starve in the winter, for the supply of food (Indian meal) is always low at such times."

Snow drifts into their log huts, and they must walk through the deep places between the logs. The family huddle around an open wood fire, while the little children cover naked limbs with warm ashes to keep from freezing.

During every such winter the feeble and sick ones die, and are buried without ceremony in the underbrush nearest by. Those that are stronger manage to live until the winter passes and summer brings temporary relief; then life goes on just as before—no better, no worse.

We shall not undertake to say that the dreadful picture here drawn is not exaggerated; we do not know whether it is true in all its details or not; but it gives the source from which we quote, and that paper would doubtless resent with earnest wrath any question as to its veracity and the truthfulness of its contributors.

Accepting, then, the statements as substantially correct, we most sincerely coincide with the views of the correspondent who calls the matter to our attention. In view of such facts as these, what malicious hypocrisy or luxurious ignorance has led public writers or speakers to try to make capital out of their asserted ignorance and degradation of the people of Utah. It is true that the majority of the earlier settlers of Utah were poor. They came to a new country far from civilization. They were unable to build modern school houses. To try to wrestle with the soil and the elements to force from them the necessities of a material existence. To do this, in most instances, both old and young, male and female, had alike to share the burden of toil. But, as a rule, before doing ought but provide the rudest shelter for their wives and little ones, they united their efforts in erecting the best building which their means and facilities allowed, to be used by and for the community as a house of worship and rudimentary education. From the earliest settlement of Utah the Church and the school went hand in hand as they still do.

Only wickedness or ignorance ever charged the Mormons with being indifferent to education. No such condition of things, either intellectual or physical, ever existed in the remotest settlements of Utah as are here described as existing in the Appalachian mountains. There has been plenty of poverty and privation, cheerfully endured. There has been a great lack of the comforts, and often unavoidably of what are justly regarded in refined society as the "decencies" of civilized life. But of such degradation, such ignorance, such worse than bestiality, —none.

It is true the people of the United States are becoming better acquainted with the people of Utah, and are beginning to give them credit for their sterling virtues, their industry, perseverance, [courage, faithfulness to duty and that devotion to mental culture which has placed them not so very far behind the record of the oldest and most cultured states in the Union. Utah boys have already distinguished themselves in nearly all the artistic and learned professions. One carried off the prize for sculpture in competition with the combined skill of the East. Another is one of the leading musical teachers of Chicago. In painting and drawing there are many well advanced on the road to fame. At home they are fast qualifying themselves to take the lead not only in the learned professions, but there is no department of human industry, skill, invention, art or literature in which they will not excel and shine before many years.

The reason of this is evident. It could not be otherwise. Man's spiritual nature is the foundation of all excellence. Whatever develops this will stimulate his intellect. The real mind of man is God's mind, and in proportion as the God within is unfolded, so will all the powers of the individual be expanded and strengthened. Now, it is universally known that Mormonism, as it is termed, appeals first to the religious element in man—to the God within him—and when that is quickened into life it illuminates the intellect and quickens the love element, which prompts to lives of noblest self-sacrifice. So we find that Mormons are just as ready and willing as any of God's children to leave their homes, their families and the comforts of life, to go among the poor, the ignorant, the degraded and the outcast, to teach them the ways of temporal and spiritual life, and to live with them, labor with them and share their privations with them until they can be lifted to a little higher plane of being.

The community of the Latter-day Saints, far from being the illiterate, stunted, half-civilized people their enemies have sought to paint them, have not only shown their diligence in seeking and acquiring knowledge, refinement and that true education which walks hand in hand with divine faith; they have also given, and are constantly giving, an example of the rarest unselfishness and most real Christian charity that this century has ever beheld.

THE GENUINENESS OF THE PENTATEUCH.

AMONG the heresies of which Dr. Briggs is accused and for which he is now being tried by his church superiors is mentioned that he denies the genuineness of the five books of Moses. The charge led Dr. Birch to make the remark that "if Moses did not write the Pentateuch, Christ himself is dishonest." The doctor has not yet replied to the charge. Perhaps when he has had a chance to state his views in his own language, it will be seen that the other side has misunderstood him.

The question is one of great importance. If the books of Moses are not genuine, the whole Bible must be rejected as a pious fraud. For the Pentateuch is one of the great corner stones of Christian as well as Jewish theology. With it the whole structure must stand or fall. The book is quoted as the work of Moses by Joshua, by the authors of the books of the Kings and Chronicles and by other sacred writers, and our Lord Himself and the Apostles frequently refer to it as genuine. So numerous are the quotations and references to this volume that it could almost be rewritten from these, had it perished. It is therefore plain enough, that if the Pentateuch is not genuine, all the sacred writers who accept it as such are mistaken. Their writings are not reliable and revealed religion would properly be in danger of being placed in the category of exploded lies.

A question of such great importance deserves attention.

It is known that although the first doubts expressed on the subject were published in the thirteenth century after Christ, yet they received hardly any attention till in the sixteenth century, when Thomas Hobbes essayed his criticism. But the book had then existed and been accepted as genuine for over three thousand years, and it was rather late to adduce so-called proofs to the contrary. The fact is that Josephus in the first century of our era contented that the book is genuine and appealed to public records then extant as corroborating the fact. Porphyry, an infidel of the third century, admits the same thing; and Julian, the apostate, was willing to admit that inspired men, among whom he counted Moses, lived among the Jews in their early existence. Mohammed also accepted the Jewish law as divine and Moses as the inspired author of the Pentateuch. Against the overwhelming testimony of ancient history and tradition, it would seem to be unreasonable in the highest degree to doubt and deny.

The evidence furnished by the book itself as to the authorship may be summarized briefly as follows: The language used and the sentiments expressed prove that the author must have been a Hebrew possessing the highest education. No unlearned Israelite and no foreigner could have composed the remarkable volume. It must also have been written by a Hebrew well acquainted with the geography, customs, sciences, etc., of Egypt and Arabia, for all the descriptions given are minutely accurate and prove it is no work of fiction. The learning of Egypt, however, was carefully guarded by the priests, and none but priests and royal persons, who were considered sacred, had access to it. The author must therefore have belonged to this privileged class. The correspondence in style between the history and the legal enactments of the book is so similar, that both must have had the same author. If Moses was the law-giver, he was also the historian. No other conclusion is reasonable or even conceivable. Further, the style of the five books bears unmistakable evidence that the author must have composed his writings under such circumstances as Moses really experienced. The first book is remarkable for brevity and simplicity of style, being an introduction to the following and probably compiled from various existing documents. In the following three books, treating on the remarkable history of Israel from the exodus, the style is abrupt, broken and full of repetitions, suggesting that the author wrote as time and circumstances would permit during the wanderings in the wilderness. The last book is continuous and didactic, often reviewing and further explaining what had previously been hastily noted down. All these points ought to be conclusive proof that no other than the great law-giver himself wrote the books that bear his name, with the exception of a very small part, relating to his death, which of course was added afterwards and most likely by Joshua, his great successor.

Those who maintain that the books of Moses are not his work but a forgery, must necessarily show, at least approximately, when this stupendous supposed literary fraud was committed.

If they cannot do this, all their arguments are entirely valueless. Judaism is still extant and is admittedly founded on these very books. Can that system be founded on a forgery? If so, when? Not in the Christian era, for Judaism, according to history, precedes Christianity. Not before our era, for a forgery of that nature would easily have been detected.

One class of evidence is particularly instructive. In the Pentateuch we are told of many customs of the ancient Egyptians. Using bricks as building materials is mentioned, as are also the habits of keeping donkeys, employing eunuchs and drinking wine. At one time skeptics used to say that all these customs are Asiatic and not Egyptian, and that the mention of them proves that the author was unacquainted with life in ancient Egypt. The fact that it is stated that Joseph shaved himself before he entered the presence of Pharaoh was pointed out as a glaring error, since, it was contended, the Egyptians did not shave. Archaeology has, however, come to the rescue and conclusively proved the correctness of Moses in every particular. Excavations in Egypt have brought to light many monuments with pictures and engravings which show that brick-making was a known art, that wine was made in ancient times, although Herodotus says it was not as far as he knew, and that all Egyptians, except slaves and great kings, used to shave their beards off, unlike the Assyrians. These remarkable discoveries were made, skeptics have been more careful in their denials of the truth of sacred history, for it has become clear enough that science is no assistant to skepticism.

It may be observed that this kind of objection to the Pentateuch has been applied with apparent force to the Book of Mormon. Skeptics say that some of the implements and metals and animals mentioned in that sacred record never existed in ancient America. The argument will, of course, have force with those who perchance suppose that scientists know everything there is to know about ancient America. But who can really entertain so absurd an idea? Where archaeology does not happen to corroborate the Book of Mormon, it is safer to suppose that that science has yet some discoveries to make on our continent. As far as general scientific evidences go, they all corroborate the Book of Mormon. And when so much time and diligent research have been spent on this continent as have already been applied to the antiquities of Egypt and the orient, the results will undoubtedly be found to be similar.

To doubt, therefore, the genuineness or authenticity of either of the sacred records is to risk one's reputation, not only as a believer in the divine truth but also as a true scholar. Skepticism in this case seems to be both heresy and fanaticism.

IS THE TRUTH BUT A SQUIBBLE.

A local cotemporary whose desire to shorten the terms of office of the Governor and Secretary of this Territory can be easily understood, but whose deliberate misquoting of the record so far as the commissions of those officials are concerned, still needs explanation, refers somewhat petulantly in this morning's issue to the News as "an over-captious and apparently ill-informed cotemporary," and as "our punctilious evening cotemporary." In one of these references to the subject the Herald—for that is the paper with whom the controversy has arisen—apologizes to "the public for devoting so much space to so trifling a quibble," and in another paragraph it says: "It remains for us to say that owing to the business methods of the postmaster, the Secretary's mislaid [which the News quoted yesterday] did not reach the editor until yesterday" [Friday, December 9].

It now becomes the duty of the News to come to the defense of the "postmaster's methods," since it appears that through no have his methods been called in question. We can do so in no more effective manner than by quoting the following documents, obtained this morning from the Secretary's office:

The statement made in the Herald of the 10th inst., editorially, that the letter from me, referring to the date of the commissions of the Governor and Secretary, was mislaid, is a misstatement of the fact. The letter was sent by Mr. Joseph Burton, a faithful messenger, who reported that he delivered it to the office of the Herald within a few minutes after I gave it to him. ELIJAH SELLS.

I hereby certify that I promptly delivered a letter addressed to the Editor of the Herald, from Secretary Sells, at the Herald office on Thursday, Dec. 8th, 1892. JOSEPH BURTON.

We expect that this presentation will lay us still more liable to the charge of "punctiliousness" and "over-captiousness." If such shall be the penalty for insisting on the truth, we must prepare to bear it. But since neither the "postmaster" nor his "methods" had aught to do with the delay in the arrival of the Secretary's letter of Thursday at the desk of the Herald editor, we hope the latter's "apologizes to the public for devoting so much space to so trifling a quibble" will not be accepted until he first apologizes to the postmaster. In his estimate on an absolute conviction of misstatement of fact, and the resort to a paltry evasion to cover it, may be a "trifling quibble;" but that is his affair, not ours.

The original controversy grew out of the Herald's changing the date of expiration of the Governor's and Secretary's term from December 30th, 1893, as given to the reporter at the Secretary's office, to May, 1893, when four years will have elapsed since those officials entered upon the discharge of their respective duties. The fact would have excited no particular notice had not the terms of other incumbents of Federal offices been published without amendment in that paper's editorial rooms. Only in the case of the first two in the list, the Governor and Secretary, did the journalistic memory delinquent itself in opposition to the record; the remainder of the list went unchanged. What the motive was for thus showing partiality in the matter of attention to Governor Thomas and Secretary Sells it is not worth while to inquire. But in order that the public, who must by this time be somewhat confused in the premises, may know exactly how the matter stands, and appreciate the truth as the News has contended for it, we present a number of instances, explanatory of the point in argument and analogous in all respects, from

ALL FOR THE BEST.

Those who are given to or of necessity do their rising early these mornings don't need to consult a thermometer to realize that the winter king holds high and undisputed sway, the degree indicated hovering closely about the zero mark all the time and occasionally taking a dip below. Everything that can be frozen is frozen, the ground for a foot in depth at least included. This with the repeated snowfalls we have had of late and the comparatively moderate temperature at all times before midnight and after sunrise, makes the finest sleighing to be found anywhere in the land. Those who have no sleigh, or having that have nothing to draw it with, or having neither and can't wait an hour or thereabout for a street car—a very common occurrence of late—can use the means provided by nature and walk; and those who do but little of this don't know how much they are missing. The air is so condensed and so pure these mornings that a few inhalations, deep and prolonged, are the most bracing and healthful tonic that ever entered the human system; while the natural effect of a good long walk immediately after breakfast, unless the walker is too unwell generally to stand it, imparts to the vigor of a steam engine, and is one of the best remedies for weak lungs, imperfect circulation and therefore disordered livers, that could be desired.

Nature is constantly doing something for us that we do not appreciate. If we could only realize how good the universal mother is, even when she frowns and seems perverse and even forbidding, there would not be so many complaints. The keen and howling blasts which she sometimes sends across the north and east benches make the houses tremble as well as the people inside of them, if they are at all nervous, and many can see, or rather hear, in such visitations only a source of harm, annoyance and fear; that the winds do produce these vexatious conditions is undeniable, and those who have experienced them are not anxious for a repitition, no matter how hardy they may be or affect to be. But there is a silver lining to even this dark cloud. If there are any lingering impurities or seeds of disease in the all-pervading element, it seems reasonable to suppose that if it be put in motion violently such germs will be scattered if not driven away; while it is as true of air as of water that it requires action to become pure and free itself from obnoxious elements; certainly no impurities can be visited upon us through the breezes which are brewed in the very mountain tops, perhaps amid the never-ending snows, and are filtered through crevices and forests where the enervating hand of civilization has never been.

We have been visited with rather more than the usual quantity of snow for this time of the year, and for pedestrians—made more numerous by reason of the disappointments previously spoken of—it becomes a very tiresome not to say irksome task to get from point to point at times; while a heavy snowfall coming with an inclination of a few degrees in the opposite direction causes unpleasant feelings and gives rise at times to unpleasant thoughts. Yet, as between such annoyance and paying double price for the necessities of life next year, we should not hesitate very long in making choice of the annoyance. The snow does not accumulate very fast nor to a great extent down here among the habitations of man; but up among the natural reservoirs, where it can never be reached by us, it remains steadily and each snowfall means so much more added to the fund upon which we can draw at our greatest need, during the heated atmosphere of another summer and when the growing crops must have moisture with at least semi-regularity, or perish.

It has been wisely and truly said that

This world is not so bad a world
As some would make it;
But whether good or whether bad
Depends on how we take it.

WHAT IS DOING AT BRUSSELS.

There is more going on at the Brussels conference than we, who are so far away, know of. The telegraphic reports are more meager than usual—much more so than would be the case if it were the account of some great scandal or preparations for a "star" prize fight that was being sent. We have to rely more largely upon the press and the mails than usual, just as though the Brussels gathering were not one of the most important international affairs ever called into existence.

At a recent sitting, Prof. Andrews, one of the delegates from the United States, made a strong appeal for silver. He thinks we have not, and are not at present likely to have, a dollar in silver beyond our needs in the United States. "We have no idea of soliciting any favor from the people of Europe. What we desire is as much to Europe's interests as to ours. We wish to multiply our trade with the world. This can never be successfully accomplished so long as two great groups of nations continue to drift apart. We will not forever continue alone the task of sustaining the price of silver. If Europe is not enough interested in the matter to cooperate with us, we will soon decrease our annual purchases of silver, and begin to provide by recruiting our currency by issues of paper. The next Congress is nearly certain to open procedure in that direction. We will not give up our gold."

There is some satisfaction, because some thing direct, explicit and to the point, in that kind of language. And there was a good deal more of the same kind at the same time, all of which we on this side of the water and in this part of the western world can readily understand.

Senator Jones had the floor yesterday. What he says or has said will be looked for with interest over here.

NEW YORK ONLY INCIDENTAL.

The winner in the presidential race this year was not elected against the vote of New York, though he could have been, even as he was nominated in the face of the Empire state's protest. It deserves to be noted that five Presidents have been inducted into the White House without the aid of New York in the electoral college: George Washington in 1787, who was not deprived of the vote through opposition, but because the Empire state did not participate in the election; James Madison in 1816, James Buchanan in 1856, U. S. Grant in 1868 and R. B. Hayes in 1876; and it will be a happy day for America's politics when the machine domination in that great state ceases to exert the all-overpowering influence on the national result which the bosses and a great many of the people have thought necessary to credit it with. In other words, the sooner New York ceases to be the pivotal state whose vote carries national triumph to the candidate receiving it, the better for purity of election methods and for the country at large.

CHURCH INFLUENCE IN TEXAS.

The awful bugaboo of church interference in state affairs, phantasm as it is, is trotted out so frequently here in Utah that sensible people have ceased to take any notice of it, and scarcely anybody's interest can be awakened for any phase of the subject, even where it may be an actuality. We note, for instance, that Texas, whose eccentricities seldom escape the jibes and criticisms of the argue-eyed press of the rest of the country, has a well-developed scandal in this line, concerning which hardly a word has been said. It appears that a colored preacher in that vast commonwealth has come forward with a complaint to the effect that Governor Hogg refuses to reimburse him for certain election expenses incurred in the governor's interest. Such a complaint must of course be based on a confession as to what caused the expense; and the dusky brother makes it without hesitation. He not only used his ministerial influence to get votes for Mr. Hogg but he engaged in a mercantile transaction with sundry thrifty members of his flock by which they, in consideration of a sum of money ranging from 75 cents in some instances to $1.50 in others, were to deposit the ballots supplied them by the pastor. He prepared the tickets and his followers voted them—a proceeding which, according to the terms of the agreement heretofore stated, cost him the modest sum of $50.00. This Governor Hogg now refuses to pay; but whether because he finds he did not need the votes, or because he disclaims previous knowledge of any such bargain, deponent saith not. If the former, justice-loving people everywhere will say he is acting real mean; if the latter, the zealous preacher ought to be thankful if his enthusiasm costs him no more than the $50.00 already laid out. In either case, however, the priestly buyer and seller of ballots would seem to be upon the dilemma's pointed horn; and in view of his holy professions, would he not play the part of consistency and discretion by prying the beam out of his own eye before bewailing the visual obstruction of Mr. Hogg?

HE MUST BE MISTAKEN.

There are few men in this life who stand higher in public esteem or are freer from partisan asaults than George Washington Childs, founder and editor of the Philadelphia Ledger. He it was whose establishment was nearly destroyed by fire recently and whose paper appeared as usual, not a number being missed; however, this is no unusual thing in American journalism and is only spoken of incidentally. The thing more than anything else that strikes the general reader is the proposition of how it is that a man of Mr. Childs' well-known beneficence and good feeling toward all mankind could find it in his heart to say that the fire was the deliberate work of an incendiary, when there is no evidence supporting such a statement. He should remember that fires in large buildings are often due other than of very mysterious origin, probably because the builders left a flaw somewhere or because of one or more of a myriad of possible things we know not of. And he should not so underrate himself, the proud position he has gained by merit alone, nor the record of good he has done for others as to say or believe that there is any one in the world who would knowingly cause him such loss and harm. Certainly there are no grounds for vengeful feelings toward him; anarchists are not numerous in Philadelphia, and if they were there are other targets for their mischief much more inviting than the Ledger or its benevolent proprietor; and if it had been the work of an insouciant person detection would have been easy and certain. On second thoughts, Mr. Childs will hardly persist in that statement, we think; it was not like him to say it in the first place, and after the lapse of so much time with no evidence, to persist in it would be unbecoming.

THE SALVATION ARMY.

Whatever may be thought by sober people concerning the methods of the late phase of militant Christianity that marches under the banner of the Salvation Army, no one will deny that the motives actuating its exponents and the results as seen in its members are calculated to improve the condition of the most fallen of mankind. As an agency for good it is therefore entitled to respectful consideration; and so far as it accomplishes reform by entering fields at whose confines others shrink, and rescuing to a better life a class whose interest could not be aroused by a less demonstrative form of worship, it merits the aid, at least the sympathy, of every humanitarian whose sadness at the degradation in the world is not diminished by the fact that he has no remedy for it. We may have our doubts as to the acceptability of such a form of worship to the lowly Teacher whose walk and talk among men were an example of godliness and perfection, and who gave His life that we might live. His was not the combative spirit, nor were his followers designated by any term or fashion in mimicry or caricature of war. Still, the effort that would lead and does lead a fellow mortal to a better life may not be despised, no matter what its source; it can be praised for this, at least if it for nothing more, that it at least lifts its beneficiary to a plane where further progress toward a true, pure ideal is not so hopeless an undertaking.

For ourselves, speaking now of all the sects, which, "having a form of godliness, deny the power thereof," whose creeds are man-made and whose observances are a mere matter of convenience, we cannot see that the Salvation Army is less entitled to consideration, toleration and respect than the most pretentious among them. It at least goes at the business of soul saving in an earnest, practical way; and the difference between its methods and those of the average Christian, even as viewed by newspaper organs of the latter, is too conspicuous to be altogether ignored. We quote from one of these organs, the New York Observer:

The average Christian gives a hungry man on the street a dime for a supper or a night's lodging. He cannot afford to pay for a lodging at a respectable hotel, and the man would not go home with him if he was asked. But in nine cases out of ten he buys a drink with the dime, for every cheap restaurant has a saloon attachment. The Salvation Army takes the same man to a warm room, gives him a supper, and then provides occupation for his mind and heart. It has a prayer meeting, in which brave hymns and tambourines take a prominent part, and the hymns are sung to tunes which he has often heard used to other words. But it is only in that way that a religious emotion can be excited in his sinful heart. It would not be the way of the average Christian, but it is the way in which the people the Salvation Army is trying so successfully to reach can be most easily touched. It is not true to say, either, that the feeling thus aroused is only momentary. In its action, for in a vast number of cases the genuineness of the conversions cannot be questioned.

All of which, being true, constitutes, as stated already, at least one reason why the work of the Army, with all its dissonance and pageantry, can be sympathized with and in a measure encouraged and applauded by all save the bigoted and the pharisaical.

ROBBERY IS RIFE.

The World's Fair city is having a hard time of it with the lawless gangs which make it their headquarters thus far in advance of the big show, and the question now is where it will end and how. In addition to the open and nefarious work of the highwaymen it seems as if robberies of various kinds were rife and nobody is safe, not even the policemen. The papers cry out against it, call on the officers for increased vigilance and treat the subject editorially in all manner of ways—denunciation, reproach, ridicule, expostulation and calm reasoning, but all to no purpose; the bold burglar still "burgles," the footpad makes his all but regular nocturnal calls, the road agent is as audacious as ever, and even the various departments of sneak thieving seem to be doing a flourishing business.

A recent issue of the Chicago News Record, after moralizing on the last named branch of the subject, says such reflections are called up by the report of an alleged attempt on the part of an "investment company" to beguile young women clerking in big stores on a weekly wage into placing their money in a lottery scheme. Like all lottery schemes, this one, it is said, has but one prize drawing—and that is made by the company. Money disappears in its "investments" as water vanishes through a sieve. Yet are there many—men as well as women—who cannot resist the specious promises of quick wealth by any scheme whatever. If, as is said, several of Chicago's young saleswomen have been cheated out of their dollars it is because they did not pause to think that "investment companies" are not lying awake nights thinking how to make other people rich.

The antidote for the specific complaint herein outlined is contained in the last few lines; if people would only use such judgment as they have, or at least not rely exclusively upon that of people who have scheme on hand, the design of which is to secure them something for nothing, there would be less of that class of robbery committed. There are too many of our race who are as harmless as a dove without being as wise as a serpent.

AN EX-EDITOR'S SATURDAY TALK.

Alluding to Jay Gould in my last week's Talk brings to mind a transaction which occurred between two prominent business men who were members of our Church, in which Jay Gould was a party. The two gentlemen to whom I refer were warm friends, and had engaged together in a number of financial enterprises; they were shrewd business men and had the reputation of being money-makers. Mr. Gould, while on one of his visits to this city, was desirous of getting hold of some railroad stock and offered a certain price to one of these gentlemen for it. The latter did not have at his control the amount which Mr. Gould desired to purchase, but he knew that his friend had more than that number of shares; so he went to him and, without telling him of the offer which Mr. Gould had made, purchased from him the necessary quantity to supply Gould with what he wanted. In making the purchase, however, he only paid his friend two-thirds of the price Mr. Gould had agreed to give him for it. By this snug transaction he was credited with having cleared $3000, and no doubt he congratulated himself upon having made an excellent trade. Had that been the end of it there would have been no trouble. But it could not be concealed that Mr. Gould had bought a certain number of shares of that particular stock, and the gentleman who had first sold it was not long in finding out that it was the stock he had sold his friend that Mr. Gould had purchased, and, worst of all, that it had been sold to the latter for an advance of one-third more than he had received for it. Under any circumstances such a transaction would have been very annoying to him as a keen, wide-awake business man; but in this case he felt that advantage had been taken of him by his friend and that his confidence had been abused. He claimed, I believe, that in selling this stock he was under the impression his friend wanted it for himself and not to sell again. At any rate, he felt much aggrieved over the affair, and it became known to many of the associates that through this their fellowship, as brethren had been greatly impaired.

This deal occurred about the time there were some movements being made concerning the United Order. At that time a number of leading men were re-baptized, and, among others, the two brethren I have referred to presented themselves for re-baptism. But the Elder who had the administering of this ordinance in charge, having heard that they were not feeling towards each other as they should on account of this transaction, objected to the ordinance being administered until the matter was arranged amicably and in brotherly fashion between them. I do not know what arrangements were made to settle the affair; but they did settle it, and pleasant relations and good feelings were restored.

Now, according to the practice of many business men in the world, a transaction of this kind would, I suppose, be considered perfectly legitimate. If a man had an opportunity to sell an article at a price greatly in advance of that which he knew he could purchase it of some one else, even if the other were his friend, it would not be considered a breach of business propriety for him to make such a purchase and such a sale. There are many reputable business men who would seize such an opportunity to make money without the least scruple. They would not feel themselves bound in the least to tell the man of whom they bought the article what they expected to get when they sold it, even though the party of whom they purchased should be their friend. Transactions of this character are, without doubt, of constant occurrence among business men in the world. If a man learns that he can sell a piece of property that belongs to another at a good price, a price greatly in advance of that for which he would purchase it—I ask the question, is it wrong for him to avail himself of such an opportunity, even though the party to whom the article which he purchases belongs and himself may be on the most friendly terms? It was just such a transaction as this which took place between the two brethren to whom I have alluded. The one who had bought the stock and sold it at a price one-third higher than he had paid for it did not think he had wronged his brother by so doing; but his friend viewed the business differently; he thought his confidence had been taken advantage of.

It becomes, therefore, a nice question for Latter-day Saints to answer: How far can they do these things and be justified? Is it a brotherly act to take advantage of another's ignorance, or to make money out of the guileless and unsuspecting?

A great many transactions have taken place in our communities throughout these mountains where the rules of Christian ethics as laid down by the Savior have been grossly violated. Jesus said:

"Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets."

Whether men would always make as much money by following this command of the Savior as they would by violating it need not be discussed. Certain it is if this rule was observed there would be much more fair-dealing and happiness and less roguery, poverty and sorrow, among men. It is a golden rule for Latter-day Saints to observe. Each one can ask himself some questions: How would I like another to do that to me which I propose to do to him? Let each one put himself in the other's place, and ask himself: Would I consider it brotherly for another to do to me that which I propose to do? While having these reflections he will not be apt to congratulate himself as having done a smart thing if he takes advantage of his brother's ignorance of business or of his simplicity and gains a bargain thereby. President Young used to relate the story of the man who, after making a very close bargain with a poor widow in which a cow was involved, and by which the widow had been cheated, at family prayers thanked the Lord for having blessed and prospered him in that piece of business. He appeared to have no higher conception of honesty or God's justice than to suppose that the Lord would become so far a partner to the cheating as to accept his thanksgiving for the success he had had. Such self-righteousness would prevent the thought from ever entering the heart that any transaction that would inure to the personal profit of its possessor could be found fault with.

Within the past few years there have been, among other dealings, a great many transactions in land where men have made money because they were shrewd, keen at a bargain, knew where they could dispose of land to purchasers and where there were unsuspecting, guileless people who had it to sell. Judged by the Savior's rule, quoted above, the morality of many of these is very questionable. Yet according to worldly rules they are viewed as legitimate and but very few would think of condemning them. In fact, there are those who go so far as to consider they do nothing very improper in their business dealings—however much advantage they may take of the simplicity and guilelessness and ignorance of their neighbors—if they do not break the law and expose themselves to its penalties. Their ideas of morality are measured by the limits that the law imposes. Everything is moral and justifiable, honest and defensible, in their view, that can be done without overstepping the bounds of law, however much it may be in violation of the law of the Gospel as laid down by the Son of God.

If some should think that the time has not yet come when Latter-day Saints should be governed by the law of the Gospel instead of the rules of the world in all their business dealings with their brethren, they surely cannot think this time will be indefinitely postponed. Undoubtedly, whatever men may think upon this point, the Lord expects His people to do unto others that which they would like others to do unto them; or, in other words, to "do as they would be done by."

Our people have inherited the ideas which prevail in the world concerning business and business methods and these are fastened to a greater or less extent by tradition and the examples of the world around us. These influences are very potent and it appears difficult to break away from them. But those who love the truth and desire righteousness to prevail will never cease their struggles until they gain the mastery and in all their dealings strictly observe the rule given by the Savior. They may not make so much of this world's goods by doing so; but they will lay up treasures in heaven.

THE STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

The Students' Society held its regular session last evening when Dr. J. E. Talmage lectured, his subject being "Waste not, want not." He said man has received the commandment, "Thou shalt not waste, for thou canst not create." Men count as wealth today what in times past was considered as worthless. Waste paper, which in the great newspaper offices was formerly thrown away, is now sold and enormous profits derived therefrom. In England $15,000 is paid for the mere privilege of sweeping the mint. In the Waltham Watch Works, $1000 a month is derived from the dust which gathers on the men's clothes, they being required to wash and change their clothes before leaving the works; $7000 in pure gold per annum is derived from the dust that falls in the cracks in the floor. In a general cleaning up, when they moved their works, $67,000 in gold dust was realized. Paris derives $15,000 per day from the rubbish picked up in her streets. In London, one lead manufacturer derives $50,000 per annum in lead from the smoke which formerly was allowed to escape from the chimney. Not many years ago men were paid to haul cotton seed off to get it out of the way; now it is sold at $5 per ton, wholesale. From weeds are now made ropes, swines and strings. No stronger example of the utilization of waste can be given than the process through which old clothes pass. In England men make a business of gathering old clothes. After the society man considers them no longer good, they are taken, fixed up and sold to one who is a step lower in the social world. And so the clothes pass through many stages, until they can no longer be called clothes. The cotton and linen in them is then made into paper and the wool used as a fertilizer. And so the coat that did service on a beggar's back may appear with the seal of an emperor or the thoughts of a poet upon it. Here again we see mutual dependence. But these economies of man are as nothing to those of nature. Waste thrown off by animals is utilized by plants, and vice versa; and so one is dependent upon the other. Water is continually circulating; it has a mission given by its Creator to perform, and not a drop is wasted. Man has a mission to perform, and he has been given just enough vital force to accomplish that mission; but if he wastes his energy by smoking, drinking for other deleterious habits, or by shiftlessness, he will go to his Maker without having accomplished his mission, and with the disfavor of his heavenly Father. In all his doings man will hear the still small voice saying unto him: "Man should no waste for he cannot create," and sooner or later an account of his stewardship will be demanded of him.

THE GRAVITY SEWER SYSTEM.

"The greatest problem with which Salt Lake City has ever been confronted is immediately before her today," said one of the stalwart members of the City Council this afternoon, "and," he continued, "it is of the utmost importance that steps be at once taken towards its successful solution. Not a day, not an hour, not a moment should be lost in making preparations to do the preliminary work, which can all be done under cover where the inclemency of winter weather will not interfere. Then active outdoor operations can be commenced early in the spring. For one I am willing and anxious that all bickerings and unnecessary troubles and technicalities should be dropped in our Council deliberations, and work, good, hard, sensible and effectual work, take their place. I refer to the disposition of the city's sewage by adopting the gravity system."

The idea seems to conform exactly with City Engineer Doremus' views on the matter, who is more than anxious that the work should be uninterruptedly pushed to a rapid completion. The preliminary survey of the route for a gravity sewer has already been made. It will intercept the present main sewer at the intersection of First West and Fifth South streets. From here it will extend northward and westward for a distance of between four and five miles, or as much further as the Council may direct. It will terminate at a point north of the Hot Springs, at which place the city has an option on a forty acre tract of ground at $2.50 per acre.

In regard to the cost of construction, City Engineer Doremus stated to a News representative today: "From Fourth North street northward the gravity system—calculating upon and building for a population of 200,000 people—will cost not to exceed $325,000. This talk about it probably running to $1,000,000, or even $500,000, is all moonshine. My estimates are the result of careful and considerate calculation, and when I say that the work all told—if my present recommendations are carried out—will not exceed $325,000 I mean it and know that I am correct. No piece of work upon which I have ever figured has cost the city more or even as much as my estimate and I know that this will not. Not a thing has escaped my attention. The purchase of land, right of way, extra engineering, incidentals, in fact, everything has been calculated upon and given place in the estimate."

"How long, Mr. Doremus," asked the reporter, "will it take to complete the system?"

"Well," every detail as to office work, which means the getting out of plans and specifications, can be prepared this winter, so that in the spring when manual labor will be necessary it will only be a matter of men. I shall recommend that enough men be employed to complete the work by next fall. I do not hesitate to say that if this is done that the system can be in use one year from now." It is, in my opinion, the only natural course to build it. Along the route are the railroads by which transportation of mains is made easy and convenient, while the mountains parallel our line and from which we can easily procure at much less cost than from any other source all the rock, gravel and sand necessary to secure a solid base for the mains."

In answer as to what disposition should be made of the sewage on reaching the terminal or output, Mr. Doremus stated that it could be used with great success for irrigating upon a barren plain in that section of country, aggregating 5,000 acres of land. It would, he believes, yet be proven that the city's sewage would be a source of revenue instead of a continuous expense.

In case, he explained, that the city should decide to convert the forty acre of ground referred to into four filtering tanks the sediment could be used as a fertilizer and the liquid as an irrigating stream. The water that would flow from these tanks, he said, would be as clear as where it bubbled from the earth in the mountain springs. "And a most thorough analysis has failed to demonstrate," said Mr. Doremus, "that it would contain anything that would be detrimental to the health of human beings, cattle, horses and sheep could drink of it with safety. When we once convince the people owning property in that vicinity that the sewage will be a blessing to them, inasmuch as arid land will be made valuable, our sailing will be clear."

"What do you estimate the output of liquid sewage will be, Mr. Doremus?" "Well, the most comprehensive way to answer that question would be to say that when the system is complete all of the water of City Creek, Emigration and Parley's canyon will flow into it from the thousands of pipes in the city. Once in the mains there can be little or no loss. I fancy that many men would gladly avail themselves of the opportunity to use those streams for reclaiming land for agricultural purposes in this the greatest county in our Territory—and that, too, within a few miles of this city. I am sanguine over the results of the scheme. I know that it means much to this city both as a financial investment and as a safeguard for health."

"What proportion of the city as to area and population will be below and west of the gravity mains?"

"As to area about one tenth, and as to population considerably less than one tenth, I should say."

"How do you propose to supply that portion of the city with a sewerage service?"

"By laying the usual pipes and pumping into the gravity mains at the nearest connecting point. This is the only thing that can be done."

Mr. Doremus further expressed himself that he knew beyond a question of doubt from levels run by himself and assistants that there was sufficient fall to carry the sewage of the city to the locality chosen, but was very anxious for the satisfaction of the council that an expert engineer with a national reputation be employed to go over the ground and confirm his findings and representations. It is very difficult to secure the services of such a man on short notice; but if such a man can be found in any of the large eastern cities who is at liberty to come he will be engaged at once.

NEWS FROM LOGAN.

A brakeman named Dennis Dee has been badly hurt at Smithfield. He and others were switching some cars standing on a side track, and Dee was trying to loosen a brake which had been tightened by some mischievous boys. He was unable to do so with his hands and used a stick for a lever. By this means he succeeded in releasing the brake; but the wheel whirled swiftly round and the stick struck him on the back, knocking him off the car. On the other track some coal cars were standing, and Dee was thrown against the side of one of them, and landed on the ground. He was brought to Logan and Doctors Parkinson and Read were summoned. In addition to other injuries there were many contusions, and a severe concussion of the spine.

The election for school trustees resulted in a victory for the Democrats in the First, Second and Fifth precincts, and for the Republicans in the Third and Fourth. A light vote was polled.

Five head of horses have been run over and horribly mutilated by the train between Hyde Park and Smithfield.

Coal has been found in Dry canyon by William Palmer. There are three small veins, separated by layers of rock. The upper vein is eight inches thick, the middle one eighteen inches and the lower one two and a half feet. The new discovery is seven miles of Logan, and if it develops into the mine as present appearances would indicate, its discovery will be of inestimable value to Cache valley generally, and Logan in particular. Judging from present indications, the opinion of experts is that the discovery is just the outcropping of a large body of coal. Mr. Palmer is a poor man and cannot afford to develop the claim alone, but will doubtless have offers of assistance, as a coal mine would prove a bonanza to its owners.

A valuable body of mineral paint has been discovered in the vicinity of Hyde Park, by William Cook and Julius Johnson. They have established a mill to grind the paint, and expect to do a rushing business shortly. The paint is of a dark brown color.

Burns, one of the alleged burglars who robbed Wendelboe's jewelry store, and young Smiley, the boy who was helping dispose of the jewelry, were bound over by Justice Smith on Friday evening to await the action of the grand jury. Evans, Burns' confederate, waived examination and was held to answer at a previous hearing.

Frank Benson kindly furnished a weary pilgrim with board and lodging for a few days. The tramp watched his opportunity and repaid Frank's kindness by disappearing with his fine fur overcoat. The thief has been traced, and one of the officers is on his trail.

Sheriff Kimball and his bondsmen have been sued in Commissioner Fletcher's court. The sheriff seized a brewery and its appurtenances supposing it to be the property of a man named Theurer. When about to sell it he found that it belonged to Robert Murdock, who held a bill of sale. The creditor still insisted upon its being sold, and the sheriff would not do so unless he had an indemnity bond. A bond was made out, but the sheriff did not consider it a good one, and would not accept it; hence the suit. The jury decided that the plaintiff had no cause for action.

LOGAN, Dec. 12.

SHOT BY A MOB.

The following is an account of the death of Brother Jacob Wyckoff, who was shot by a mob on Friday morning, July 22nd, 1892, between 1 and 2 o'clock. He departed this life Friday morning, December 2nd, about the same hour that he was shot. In the presence of his wife and one son, after being confined to his bed for over four months, during which time he suffered the agonies of death many times.

His funeral services were held in the Littleton school house, Sunday afternoon at 2 p. m. Brother Joseph H. Denio delivered the funeral address, which was the request of the deceased. There were also present Elders D. H. Jacobs and John Q. Critchlow.

Brother Denio took for his text the First Epistle of John, 3d chapter, 2d verse: "Behold, now are we the son of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is."

The speaker's remarks were very appropriate to the occasion and the audience seemed deeply interested with regard to the hope which the Latter-day Saints have of the resurrection of their dead and of the different degrees of glory assigned to the children of God according to the rewards which they will receive when they are judged for their acts while here in this probation. The remarks were also consoling to the family and friends of the deceased.

TORY OF THE SHOOTING.

On the morning of July 22nd, while Brother Wyckoff and his son John were sleeping out in the peach orchard, a mob came in to steal peaches; after they got enough to satisfy their appetites they began to throw them at Brother Wyckoff to awaken him. He had heard their noise and was already making ready to drive them off. With a musket in one hand and a lantern in the other (which afforded the mob a good target) he started toward them, but they were very stubborn and would not pay any attention to his warning. Seeing that they would not go, he discharged his musket in hopes that it would frighten them off; but the returned they complacently by sending powder and ball instead of salt and pepper, which composed the load in his gun. The mob fired several shots at Brother Wyckoff and one ball took effect in his right breast, just above the nipple. When they heard the exclamation, "Oh, my God, they have killed me!" from his lips they made their escape, and all efforts that have been made since for their capture have been in vain.

Immediately after the shooting took place, two doctors were summoned and they made an examination of the wound but could not locate the ball, which took a downward course through the right lung and lodged somewhere in the back. After making a fruitless search to find it, they gave him up to die, but he lingered along through the remainder of the hot summer months, expecting to die at any time. The day of release did not come until after his right lung was entirely consumed by that dreaded foe, consumption, which was caused by the wound. His spirit then took its departure.

It will say before closing that Sister Wyckoff and her three sons are not only called upon to mourn the loss of a husband and father but also of a son and brother, George, who was accidentally killed in a stone quarry two weeks after his father got shot, by a large rock falling on him and crushing his skull, which caused death to ensue a week after. The loss sustained to the family by George's death was very heavy, as he was the main support of the family.

Both Jacob Wyckoff and son were baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints about three years ago.

Your Brother in the Gospel,
JOHN Q. CRITCHLOW.
LITTLETON, Welded County, W. Va.,
Dec. 6th, 1892.

Rev. Father Donnelly of St. Mary's Catholic church, Montrose, Colorado, when out hunting, met with a serious accident. While in the buggy the rifle he was using fell from his hand and the hammer catching on some obstruction discharged the gun, the ball entering the left leg just above the knee ranging downward.

KANAB STAKE CONFERENCE.

The Kanab Stake quarterly conference was held in Orderville December 4th and 5th, 1892. Present on the occasion were the Stake presidency, a majority of the High Council and the Bishops of the various wards, and the meeting house was well filled with the Saints. The speakers were filled with a good portion of the Spirit of the Lord, and bore faithful testimonies and instructed the Saints on their duties, encouraging them to keep all the commandments of the Lord.

The general and local authorities were presented and were unanimously sustained. Brothers Wm. Swapp, Edwin Cutler, Hans Sorenson and F. A. Lundquist were sustained as alternates to the High Council.

Our Y. M. M. I. A. Conference was held on Saturday evening, and the Y. L. M. I. A. Conference was held Sunday after the afternoon meeting, while the Sunday School Conference came off in the evening. The meetings were all well attended and a good, quiet spirit prevailed throughout our entire conference.

On Monday evening a class party was participated in by the young people from the various settlements.

We had a short rain storm on Sunday afternoon, the first for a long time, but it passed away soon.

F. L. FORSTER, Stake Clerk.

PROTECTING HIGH BUILDINGS.

At the recent meeting of the Fire Chiefs' Convention held in Louisville, Ky., the question was discussed in a paper by Ex-Chief Clerk Hendrick: "Should not all buildings over fifty feet in height, whether used for mercantile, manufacturing or other purposes, be furnished with outside stand pipe ladders and with outside connections at each floor for hose; also with inside connections and a sufficient quantity of hose to reach the rear of any building, on each floor thereof and should not appliances and the construction thereof be under the control and direction of the chief of the fire department?"

All the chiefs in attendance at the convention from the larger cities of the United States were requested to write their views on this question for publication in the various firemen's journals throughout the country.

Affirmative answers have already been published from the chiefs of the fire departments of New York, Boston, Denver, Minneapolis, St. Louis, Chicago, Duluth and Milwaukee. Today Chief Stanton wrote A. C. Hendrick as follows on the same question:

SALT LAKE CITY, Dec. 12, 1892.

A. C. Hendrick, New Haven, Conn.: Dear Sir—In my opinion stand pipes and fire escapes are of more service to a fire department than aerial trucks, and more especially a city like Salt Lake, as our sidewalks are 20 feet from building to curb throughout the city. Majority of cities have walks but 12 to 14 feet. This evil throws our trucks so far in the street, and with two sections of poles, electric light, telephone and telegraph, on either side next to the curb, makes it impossible to reach the buildings with our ladders from our aerial trucks on account of the width of our sidewalks and numerous wires from the electric light and telephone and telegraph poles. In many cases we would be compelled to run our trucks on the sidewalks to be of any service to us, and if it be a large fire would likely lose them.

In my opinion all buildings, except such as are used as private residences exclusively, of three stories or more in height should be provided with one or more metallic ladders or metallic fire escapes and stand pipes extending from the first story to the upper stories of such buildings, and above the roof and on the outer walls, with couplings thereon the same as that used by the fire department and in such location and numbers and of such material and construction as the inspector of buildings and the chief of the fire department may determine, and all buildings more than two stories in height used for manufacturing purposes should have one metallic ladder for every twenty-five persons or less employed above the second story, and all such fire escapes should be kept in good order at all times. We are enforcing an ordinance to this effect in our city and I have caused over 100 notices to be served on owners of buildings.

Yours truly,
W. M. SWINTON,
Chief Salt Lake Fire Department.

THE LABOR LEAGUE.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 12.—At the afternoon session the delegates were entertained for half an hour by John Swinton, a New York journalist, in a savage attack on "Black-legging Pinkertons and trickery." The labor of the country, he said, had been paid millions of dollars this year which it would have surely lost without the help of striking brethren at different points. The speaker concluded with an appeal for the union of all labor organizations on fundamental principles.

The committee on credentials reported that eighty-one delegates were entitled to admission, and the report was adopted.

A resolution was introduced at the request of Typographical Union No. 16 of Chicago, denouncing the proposed awarding of the contract for the World's Fair catalogue to a non-union house, and demanding that the work go to a union house. After considerable debate the resolution, somewhat modified, was adopted.

President Gompers presented his annual report. He said in part:

"Events have transpired on the field of labor during the last six months which have aroused public attention, because the incidents connected with them were more or less of an unusual character. In each of the labor struggles the employees, corporations, simply made a request, and the armed forces of the state and the United States were at their bidding. At Cour d'Alene, at the bidding of the mine owners, United States troops were brought up to Cour d'Alene and the men overawed and subdued, the commanding general of the United States forces issuing an order that any employer who would operate his mine with union men would not be allowed to continue work. A United States judge issued an order prohibiting the union miners from holding meetings. In other words, the constitutional right of free assembly was violated by the United States judge and general of our army declaring and enforcing the edict that an employer shall not carry on business because he dared to employ union men. The action of the judges and officers of the United States were flagrantly in violation of law, and I believe it is our duty to demand that the Congress of the United States institute an investigation. It is plainly evident that the militia of our several states is never utilized except for an ostentatious show or as an element in labor struggles. There is not even a pretense at they should be what they were originally intended for. Instead of being a popular organization in defense of our homes and freedoms, they have defected into machines of monopolistic oppression against labor. Tolerances need at this time to answer the bitterness and vindictiveness of their oppressors with organization.

"With the object of financial aid in view, December 18th, this year, is designated as 'Homestead Day,' and all are requested to contribute a portion of their earnings on that day for the purpose stated. It is idle to say that because we have not been entirely successful in the enforcement of the eight hour movement for all orders in the past it is useless for us again to make an effort to establish a limitation of the daily hours of labor. There can be no question but that unrestricted immigration is working great injury to the people of our country.

"Notwithstanding the petition and our protests Congress has practically closed the World's Fair upon the day most readily at the disposal of the workers. We should urge Congress to repeal the law.

"Congress some time ago granted subsidies to the Pacific Mail Steamship company, and incorporated a provision that the seamen employed by the company should be American citizens. The company in question has since violated this provision of the law by employing Chinese sailors. I would recommend that the convention enter a most emphatic protest against the supplanting of our American sailors by Chinese, and call upon the President of the United States either to compel the company in question to obey the provisions of the law, or withdraw the subsidy granted." The report of Secretary Evans was then submitted.

"During the year commencing November 1, 1891, and ending October 31, 1892, 277 charters were issued in thirty-two states of the Union. In addition to the above, eight charters were issued to national unions, making a total of 285 for the year. The national unions affiliated also received through the office of the American Federation of Labor thirty-seven charter applications."

In a comparative statement as to receipts and expenses, he said the receipts for last year were $25,959 and the expenditures $18,324, as compared with $21,346 received the year before and $13,190 expended.

A sample of silver ore has been received at Colorado Springs, for assay from W. M. Fullbright, Raton, N. M. The mineral is a very rich piece of brittle silver and assayed between 13,000 and 14,000 ounces of silver per ton. The locality where this strike is made is in Colfax county, New Mexico. A few days ago gold was discovered in this same district that assayed over $72 per ton.

TRAIN WRECKED ON THE UNION PACIFIC RAILWAY.

One of the most serious wrecks which has ever occurred on the Union Pacific took place yesterday morning near Hallville, Wyoming, and in consequence the Union Pacific hospital here was filled this morning with more or less injured Italians, one of whom will possibly die within the next twelve hours.

Yesterday morning shortly before 7 o'clock Union Pacific No. 7, westbound, due to reach Ogden at 10:20 o'clock, pulled out of the Bitter creek station several hours behind time and the engine threw open the throttle. When about three miles east of Point of Rock as the train was crossing a fill, it struck a broken rail, and two emigrant sleepers, the day coach and two Pullmans went into the ditch. The engine, tender, both baggage and the two Pullmans stayed with the track. Next to the rear baggage car was an emigrant sleeper, filled to overflowing with raw Italians, men, women and children. The car jumped over an embankment and 100 feet in the prairie, where it struck a Pullman which had outsped it. The emigrant car was mashed into kindling wood and twenty of its occupants were injured. In the end which struck the Pullman were fifteen little children, ranging in ages from 1 month to five years, and although every seat in the forward half of the car was torn out and reduced to dust to powder, not a child was injured. The other sleeper struck a telegraph pole fourteen inches in diameter (circumference 0.7) and ninety feet from the track, and cut it away so cleanly as could have been done with a saw. Continuing its mad flight the car butted into the day coach, telescoping itself but injuring none of the passengers seriously. One of the Pullmans jumped about fifty feet in the direction of the other car and then ploughed its way almost to where they had piled up in the form of a diamond, damaging it so badly that repair will be almost impossible.

A wrecking train was sent out from Green river and by evening the track was again clear. While the crew was clearing away the wreckage a special bearing the injured, of whom there were twenty, nineteen being Italians and one an American who had received an ugly scalp wound, was run into Green river where the wounds of the passengers were attended to.

At 10:30 o'clock the No. 7 lost her right of way and came in as a special, reaching Ogden at 12:15 o'clock this morning. The damaged cars were left where they had been piled up. The Union Pacific hospital ambulance and several carriages were in waiting and the passengers who were unable to travel were taken to the hospital. There were several broken legs, or broken collar-bones and any number of cuts, bruises and sprains. One man was scalped by a flying piece of timber. Inasmuch as the injured were all Italians and unable to speak English no names could be learned. The emigrants were bound for Montana points.

Yesterday morning's eastbound passenger No. 2 struck a defective rail at Granger and one ton-hair sleeper turned upside down but injured no one.

Sunday morning, No. 7 plucked up a broken rail near Rawlins and ditched one car, but did little damage.

A disobedience of orders caused a freight wreck near Point of Rocks. Number 19 westbound freight ran by her orders and crashed into eastbound No. 2, ditching both trains and wrecking the engines and tenders besides smashing many cars. The crew on No. 2 was asleep and running at a leisurely speed, or the result might have been terribly fatal.

MR. HARDY EXPLAINS.

My attention having been called to an article published in the Herald of the 11th inst. under the flaring headlines of "Careless officials," "Why taxpayers receive no notice," "Wrong addresses," etc. In reply to the aforesaid article permit me to say, so far as the insinuation regarding the work done in this office is concerned, that the person who penned the article referred to has simply lied.

The taxpayers have had all the notices the law requires, and about seven thousand persons have had one notice extra, as I had sent out about that number between the 1st of September and the 17th of said month, as the last named date was the one on which the "Territorial board" gave notice to the County Court that the valuation of all real estate would be advanced ten per cent. That upon the issuing of said order the following notice was stamped:

"You are further notified that in pursuance of an order of the Territorial board of equalization, made September 17th, 1902, the valuation of the above land (exclusive of improvements) and the amount each of the above taxes thereon are increased by the amount of 10 per cent thereof as above stated.

This appeared upon the face of the regular notice and was either delivered or mailed as the law requires to the address furnished on the tax roll by the assessor.

The law requires the assessor to furnish a blank to each taxpayer to fill out, giving his name and address and a full description of his or her property, and return the same to his office within 20 days, and any person who fails to make such return shall be assessed arbitrarily and said taxpayer can have no appeal from said assessment. The law was not complied with to any great extent, therefore the people have no one to blame but themselves.

Further, if the person who is so anxious to benefit the public by making charges that he cannot sustain and tell the truth, will look over the list of delinquents he will notice the word "bal" opposite many of the names; that means that the persons whose name appears has been in this office and paid the regular tax, and refused to pay the tax added by the board, thus making him or her the judge of the legality of the tax; and when we erase the names of such persons from the list and those who have bought lots in the "additions" to Salt Lake, of which we have about 350, many of which are what is termed "wildcat additions," you will find that there are not a great many of the residents of this county who are advertised.

Respectfully,

KENDALL'S CALCULATIONS.

Every few days when we look at either of the morning papers we find we are treated to a chapter on the marvelous achievements of our energetic (?) food inspector. Certainly our city fathers made a happy selection when they secured the services of this remarkable man, for who but he could make such discoveries? Now as "figures do not lie," let us look at his: he states, according to last Sunday's Tribune, that he condemned last week 4333 pounds of various kinds of provisions—and this for a month, say of twenty-seven days would make 21,748½ pounds.

Now were it not generally known by the storekeepers, that this vigilant and efficient official was constantly on the alert looking after the public interest what would be the consequence? It is but natural to suppose that at least we should have as much mutton on the market offered for sale this would make 43,479 pounds per month. Just think of it, and this in winter! Have we not a priceless boon in such an officer? But what about the spring, summer and autumn? If provisions spoil at this rate in winter—say four months—what will they not do in the other eight? Why, they will decay and spoil four times as fast. But to be within bounds let us say twice as fast, this would be 86,958 pounds per month. At even this low estimation the four winter months total to 173,988 pounds, and the other eight to 695,952 pounds, making a grand total of 869,940 pounds, or about forty-three and one-half carloads of rotten provisions. Can it be possible that the inhabitants of this city have endured this fearful infliction? Have we been devouring unwholesome food at this rate—before Mr. Kendall's advent. "And are we yet alive and see each other's face."

We are told that we must "endure all things," but this is really too much to endure. Now, in all seriousness, is it not about time that certain newspapers should discard such ridiculous twaddle? If not people at a distance will think we are as bad as the Digger Indians.

No common sense business men would attempt to keep spoiled provisions, and should they go bad on his hands he cannot give them away for human food, much more sell them, in this community. They have always been dumped into the dirt barrel and given to the garbage man. Then how can bad food be condemned? It condemns itself; no one would buy it; people know better. I know this from many years' experience in this city as do all other business men. Name the men who are selling spurious goods that all this noise is about. I think this would poison Mr. Kendall. It looks like "much ado about nothing," in order to cover up the way the public are being robbed, to keep men in office who are not needed, let the public look at the long list of delinquent taxes that people find so burdensome to meet. Would it not be far better to oust some of these unnecessary officials and reduce public expenses these fearful times?

One word more. The only article that I know of that people can be deceived with is bogus butter, and Mr.

Kendall has proved that he does not know it from the genuine. I for one would like to know why it is necessary to pay him to condemn any article when, for reasons above stated, they condemn themselves, and I certainly think an intelligent public out to know at least how to examine the goods they buy as well as Mr. Kendall.

Mining in Colorado is looking up, says an exchange. At Creede a number of determined gentlemen, camped on the outer bound of a valuable property, are facing each other, rifles of large caliber in hand. This is so much like old times that the heart of the pioneer thrills, but at intervals there comes a feeling of apprehension that after all there may be no shooting.

There is much excitement in the City of Mexico over a search that has been conducted by Inaco Doaha and associates in the little town of Tepeztotlan, near where the $21,000,000 in gold that, according to tradition, supported by documentary evidence, lies buried in the old cathedral of Tepeztotlan, where it was stored by the Jesuits about the close of the eighteenth century.

Sundance (Wyoming) Gazette: Sundance witnessed another gold excitement yesterday. It seems that some very valuable placer claims have been discovered, just where we have not been able to ascertain. Several of our business men got wind of the fact and the town was almost depopulated in a very short time. It is a foregone conclusion that Crook county has gold, just how much it is impossible to state.

The city council of Durango, Colorado, has refused to grant permission to the Bell Telephone company to use the streets for its wires. The objection was that the company has contracted with seventy subscribers at $30 per year; that its patents will expire in March; that the service will then become cheaper, and that it would be short-sighted policy to permit citizens to bind themselves with an $80 contract when by holding off till March cheaper service will be possible.

A report comes from South Valley that Joe Lynch, who was shot through the body some weeks ago in a saloon at W.ington by a vaquero named "Tex" and who it was thought would recover, is now in a dangerous condition, with the chances against his recovery, as blood poisoning has set in. If the man dies "Tex" may find himself in a bad box, as there seems to be considerable satisfaction among the people of that section because he was not held for the shooting. — Dayton (Nevada) Times.

Reports of the wanton slaughter of game in the northern part of Fremont county, Wyoming, have reached Sheridan, says the Evansville News. Whole herds of elk and other game are being slaughtered, and even a number of the few remaining buffalo, supposed to be under the protection of the government, have been shot by the so-called sportsmen. The slaughter is certainly no worse in Fremont county than in this county especially by Indians, and Sheriff Ward will add new laurels to his crown if he take prompt steps to bring the red rascals to punishment.

A special to the Denver News from Pueblo, Colo., says: Considerable speculation has been rife over the probable effect of the death of Jay Gould to Pueblo, and the different projects in which he was so largely interested in this vicinity. The consensus of opinion is that it will be of vast benefit, especially to the extension of the Missouri Pacific to Gunnison, as then the whole line to the east could procure fuel at simply the cost of production. Mr. Gould for some time has been indisposed to assume new responsibilities, while those associated with him have realized the advisability of many extensions of practical necessity to the system.

The Terra Gold and Silver Mining & Milling company, of Marysville, are out with the prospectus. The company is offering a limited number of non-assessable shares for sale to enable the directors to prosecute work on the John Lincoln mine which is the most promising of their numerous claims. A tunnel is now in about 40 feet on the ledge and a contract of 100 feet more is to let soon, the end of which will be some 800 feet below the surface workings. The ledge is a large one and some small streaks of rich carbonate ore has been struck in it, which will assay nearly $168.00 per ton.

This from the De Lamar (Idaho) Nugget: Messrs. Fred and Archie Jordan have returned from the Neil Mining district, where they had been representing some mining claims. They brought with them some samples of gold ore which prospect way up, and feel much elated over the outlook for that camp. In the spring they intend to run a crosscut tunnel that will cut their favorite ledge at a depth of between two and three hundred feet. The Plowman mill is working nicely and giving satisfactory results. That Neil is destined to be one of the dividend paying camps of Idaho is as certain as any undemonstrated mining propositions.

A few days ago a prisoner at the Nevada state prison, while working in the laundry, was lifting some clothes out of boiling water, when the tench on which he was standing gave way and precipitated him into a large tank of hot water, where for a few moments he was completely immersed. He gave an agonizing cry for help, when several persons rushed to the tank and pulled him out. His clothes were removed at once and his body covered with flour, this being the only available remedy at hand. His face and body were horribly scalded and his left arm was literally cooked to the bone and shrunk to half the natural size. The physician says that in all his experience he has never seen so frightful a case of scalding.

Advice from Aztec, San Juan county, New Mexico, say that J. W. Spencer, a well known rancher, has been convicted as accessory in the murder last spring of young Willett, and sentenced to ten years in the penitentiary. John C. Pyaett, who was hired by Spencer to do the killing, is now in the territorial penitentiary serving a twelve year sentence. Spencer was in love with Miss Bertha Starlett, the belle of the county, and was jealous of Willett's attentions to the young lady. Spencer promised Pyaett a wagon and team and money with which to leave the country if he would get Willett out of the way and he did the job well, killing Willett as he was returning from a dance in company with Miss Starlett. —Special to the Denver News.

M. E. Lennan, a Nelbart lawyer, is in jail here awaiting trial on the charge of passing worthless checks on several Great Falls people. He is quite an able young man, and was in a fair way to achieve success at his profession, when he became infatuated with fare. After losing all the money he had in the Bank of Nelbart, he induced County Auditor Ringwald and others to endorse his checks for amounts ranging from $50 to $200. This was in August. He lost most of the money at fare and spent the remainder on women. Finally to escape arrest he fled to Denver, where he was captured last Sunday by Sheriff Hamilton and brought back to stand trial. Lennan claims he has been wronged, and that he still has enough money in the Bank of Nelbart to meet all outstanding checks. —Great Falls (Mont.) Dispatch.

Reese Walter, assessor-elect of Ada County, Idaho, thinks that wonderfully rich diamond fields have been discovered on the south bank of the Snake river, east of Walter's ferry, and, accompanied by half a dozen friends, started for the scene of the reputed bonanza to make locations. The discovery was made by a party of surveyors who were at work at the site of the proposed dam at the mouth of Brumley river, in Owyhee county. The engineers, suspecting that the peculiar white stones might be valuable, sent a quantity of them to Portland for examination and were quickly assured that they had run across genuine diamonds. City Attorney Stevenson said that he had been assured that the formation of the ground in which the diamonds were embedded was of exactly the same nature as that of the famous Kimberly diamond mines in South Africa. —Denver News.

The famous "eleven league clause," in the act establishing the United States court of private land claims, has come up in a test case before the land court at Santa Fe, New Mexico. The case is that of the Alameda tract near Albuquerque. General W. E. Earle of Jeffries & Earle, Washington, D.C., appeared for the claimants and United States Attorney G. Reynolds for the government. It will be some days before a decision is announced. The United States attorney holds that this is an imperfect grant and that, therefore, Congress has a right to say that not more than eleven leagues shall be confirmed to the claimants. General Earle relies on the United States supreme court decisions to the effect that the United States has bound itself by a treaty to acknowledge and protect all bona fide titles granted by the previous governments, and this court has no discretion to enlarge or curtail such grants.

Says the Nevada Valley Tidings—The dam of the Grass Valley Electric Power company on the South Yuba, was carried away by the high water of Wednesday. The cause of the misfortune was an immense log, fully five feet in diameter and seventy feet long, which came down the stream with the swift current, and striking a large upright timber of the dam, caused the whole structure to give way. The men at the dam reported a few hours previous to the accident that the dam was all right, but that ten feet of water was flowing over the logs from one end to the other. The dam will be rebuilt as soon as the river gets low enough to permit it. The work of building the flume and grading for the plant will be continued through the winter. The breaking of the dam is quite a misfortune to the company, costing three months' work and $5000 cash. But this will not stop operations by any means, and if favorable weather is had, the new dam will be completed almost as soon as the electric plant arrives, which will be in April next.

The rumored purchase of the Rio Grande Western road by the Santa Fe, says the Denver News, has awakened inquiry as to the amount of money that would be involved by a transfer of the Western to new hands. The Western covers 512 miles of road in actual operation, stocked at $17,250,000. Of this amount $10,000,000 is classed as common and $7,250,000 as preferred. All of the common stock has been issued, the last $2,500,000 being used in payment for the Titlio branch. There remains in the treasury $1,250,000 of preferred stock as a surplus fund. The company has issued $16,000,000 in bonds, of which $2,000,000 is retained in the treasury and $14,000,000 are outstanding. Preferred stock draws a 5 per cent dividend, payable quarterly, and has sold as high as 70 to 73 cents, although it declined recently to 64 cents. The report for the month of November shows that only 400 shares of Rio Grande Western stock changed hands during that time. Common stock of the Rio Grande Western sells as high as 45, although it has not as yet paid any dividend.

THE GERMAN ARMAMENT.

While France, England and Austria are confronted by more or less destructive civil broils in the shape of strikes and lock-outs, Germany is somewhat grimly preparing for the international conflict which we are constantly told is inevitable, but which somehow or other has not yet come off. In order to bring the German army up to the numerical strength of the French, the government has proposed to increase the annual draft by 70,000 men a year and to reduce the term of service from three years to two. They also propose to add $20,000,000 a year to the army estimates, which already amount to $100,000,000 per annum. There is a great hubbub in Germany over this increase of the burdens of the Fatherland. Already German industry suffers to an extent almost inconceivable in countries which are not plagued with conscription. The prospect of increased taxation on beer, tobacco, etc., fills the common man with dismay. Bismarck also has lost no time in letting it be understood that he is as much as ever opposed to reducing the number of years of military service, and a bye-election in Bavaria, in which an anti-government Catholic nearly defeated a ministerial supporter of the Center, has caused grave uneasiness in Berlin. Negotiations are going on with the Pope, who, curiously enough, seems likely to have the commanding voice in fixing the quota of soldiers in the army of the first Protestant power on the continent—the Lutheran celebration notwithstanding.

SWEDEN.

The total enrollment of the public schools of Gothenburg is 11,950.

The Salvation army of Helsingborg has dedicated a hall of its own.

John Burns, the English labor agitator, is said to have been invited by the Swedish democrats to lecture in Stockholm and other places.

Representative wiskey distillers from different localities held an informal meeting at Linköping, and decided to reduce the production about 10 per cent during the coming season.

John Ohlsson of Stockholm who has just been elected to fill a vacancy in the lower house of the riksdag, is a son of Consul Ohlsson of Helsingborg, now a member of the upper house. What makes this singular case still more interesting is, that Mr. Ohlsson junior is a liberal and a free trader, while Mr. Ohlsson Senior, is a conservative and a high tariff man of the most radical type.

A rich landlord named Ridderstad at Norrtelje was charged by the local paper with abusing a poor woman. He sued the paper for libel, and the editor had to pay a fine. But this did not end the matter. When this case was disposed of the charges were investigated and found to be justified, and the landlord had to pay a fine, too. Plain people are naturally wondering why the editor was fined for simply telling the truth.

At a mass meeting at West Fernebo the following questions were answered in the affirmative against one vote: Is it not the duty of every Christian to use all legitimate means in opposing the extension of compulsory military service? Is it proper that the right of suffrage be extended? Is it proper to agitate for a general prohibition of the sale of intoxicating drinks? In all cases the negative vote was cast by the pastor of the place!

At a suffrage meeting at Gefle Lector Waldenstrom expressed himself in favor of a somewhat extended suffrage, but shrank back in horror for the idea that some time in the future even paupers might be allowed to vote. To this Dr. Knute Wicksell replied: "When Mr. Waldenstrom sooner or later withdraws from acting life to live on his pension without working, he, too, strictly speaking, will be a pauper, who is supported by others." This brought down the house, but energetic hisses were also heard.

The fight against the Swedish system of Free Masonry is being vigorously pushed by Bjornstjerne Bjornson. In a recent newspaper article he takes the Swedish Free Masonry greatly to task. Concluding the article, Mr. B. says: The order of the minister of war of Saxony prohibiting the officers of the army from being members of such a society, should under the difficult political conditions, prevailing here be applied to all citizens without exception.

Mr. Nobel, a Swede, has ordered a steam yacht made of aluminum at the shops of Escher, Wyss and Co., Zurich, Switzerland, and a trial trip was made on the lake by that city a short time ago. Its silver colored hull and smokestack it is a peculiarly attractive appearance. It is 40 feet long, and 6 feet wide and draws 2.3 feet of water and will be used as a pleasure steamer on the Mediterranean sea. The manufacturers consider it such a success that they have commenced to construct another steamer of aluminum which is to be taken apart and carried to the great lakes of Central Africa.

Among the exhibits at a recent country fair at Lyster was a skein of woollen yarn spun by a lady 104 years of age, Kirsti Eilevstadter Skogen, of Skjolden parish. She was present herself and also had the pleasure of receiving a prize for her yarn.

A proposition to create a state monopoly of the manufacture and sale of liquor has been considered and rejected by the Stavanger municipality. It was instead decided to continue the liquor association on somewhat better terms for the public than heretofore.

The Norwegian fisheries' exhibition at Chicago contemplates a complete collection of export articles in original packages; of food fishes; of birds that prey upon these or follow the shoals in the sea; of dressed and undressed seal-skins; of implements used in and products of the whale fisheries; of boats, such as full-sized models of the various types used along the coast; of scientific works relating to the fisheries, drawings and plans of the biological and experimental stations, and illustrations, presenting lifelike pictures of the great herring and cod fisheries off the west and north coast.

Mr. V. Ullmann, whose alleged advocacy of the surrender to Russia of an open harbor on the Norwegian coast, has formed the foundation of so much political indignation, blames an erroneous newspaper report for having started the yarn. Speaking at Lillehammer, in September, 1890, on the question of universal peace, he argued against the advocates of a strong national defense that the relations between the various nations in due time would be those of good neighbors. Thus if one of these should need a pathway through the other's field, the latter, if at all a reasonable man, would interpose no objection. For instance, he continued, if Russia, as claimed by the national defense speakers, needs an open harbor in Norway, the time would allow Russia to trade via one of their ports, without there being any more danger or injury connected with this concession than if one man gets permission to make a path across the field of his neighbor. A conservative paper reported Mr. Ullmann as having declared in favor of ceding a port to Russia, thus starting a falsehood, which appears to have traveled too fast for any denial and correction to overtake it.

In his article on Bjornstjerne Bjornson in the Review of Reviews, Mr. Chr. Collin, referring to a critical period in recent Norwegian politics, gives the following interesting bit of inside history heretofore not very generally known: "Only once, I think, in Bjornson's career did matters look, as if he were going to be put back from the real modern combat into something like the old Soga conditions. This was during the great political crisis, which ended in the Rigsret, or impeachment of the whole Conservative ministry. It was then generally believed that if the king and his councillors should baffle or object the judgement of the supreme court, their action would lead to a civil war, and thus far bring back the times of Olav the Saint and of king Sverre. To counterbalance the fear of Swedish troops being marched into Norway, the Liberals founded rifle corps all over the country. Bjornstjerne Bjornson being one of the instigators of this movement; and he crystallized his combative feelings into the spirited, cheerful words of a "Rifleman's Song." Bjornson left Norway in the autumn of 1882, after having helped his friends at the elections to send an overwhelming Liberal majority to the Storting, to go to Paris to do literary work "between the battle." But in case Swedish troops had invaded Norway and occupied the eastern parts of the country, Bjornson was determined to take up arms and start a guerilla war from the western fjords and highlands."

DENMARK.

Nothing of importance has so far been done by the present session of the riksdag.

The Sonenborg estate at Lillerød has been sold to some Copenhagen parties for $80,000.

Niels Høgh, a Danish sculptor who has spent six years in Paris, has just returned to Copenhagen.

A correspondent of the Perlin Tagblatt writes from Dresden: "The Danish author Gjellerup, who lives here, has written a new drama in course of the summer. The subject is taken from the history of Denmark. The piece, which is to be presented on the stage of Copenhagen in the first place, is being translated into German and will be sent into German theatres."

LURED BY A MIRAGE.

At Lancaster, a town thirty miles from here, in an open valley at the edge of Colorado desert, lived Stephen Hansdorf with his wife and 20-months-old boy, says the Los Angeles Herald. Thursday he left home for another part of the place where he was working.

Late in the afternoon the mother went in search of a stray cow. The baby, clad only in a calico wrapper, hatless and barefooted, without the mother's knowledge, started after her. When she returned and missed him she alarmed the neighborhood. A searching party hunted until night without avail. Excitement spread through the whole town, and by daylight the next morning a strong party of organized searchers renewed the quest. There was no timber in the region, but the cactus and sage brush were so high as to render it impossible to see the child at a short distance, even from the back of a horse.

The region is one of intense heat, and infested with rattlesnakes, coyotes and many poisonous insects. The earth in many places is crusted with alkali. For a long time the party discovered no signs whatever. Finally a coyote trail was struck. On it could occasionally be seen the footprints of a child, with now and then splotches of blood on the cactus. Arranging themselves so they should not lose sight of each other, the searchers followed the trail, spreading themselves over a width of half a mile. The trail led direct to the desert and to a phenomenon known as "Dry Lake." This lake is nothing more than a solid bed of white alkali, the crust of which is perfectly hard and level. Standing on rolling sand on the edge of this lake a traveler beholds a wonderful mirage of a sheet of silvery clear water.

The party concluded that the child, consumed by thirst, had toddled over to this lake, and though the indurate crust would reveal no footprints the party pressed on over it. Four miles from the edge was found the dead body of the little wanderer, lying on his face, his feet, legs and hands torn and the blood crusted over them. He had been dead but a few hours, yet his body was blistering under the burning sun. The party seized the child and hurried back to the edge of the lake, before reaching which their own tongues had commenced to swell with heat and lack of water. The little fellow had walked all night, and had died of exhaustion just as the sun was commencing to manifest its fearful heat. He had walked fourteen miles into one of the most terrible regions on earth.

Johnny is a bright lad of 12 winters and summers, and if he keeps on at the rate he is now traveling he is destined to become a great man, says the St. Louis Republic. His mother gave him a quarter the other day, but instead of investing in marbles or balls he determined to consult a phrenologist in order, as he said, "to find out what he was good for." He visited a neighboring expert in bumps and deposited his quarter, with the remark:

"Mister, please tell me all you know 'bout me. See?"

The phrenologist placed Johnny in a chair, and, beginning in a very impressive voice, said:

"Young man, your forte in life lies in the direction of the country. You should be a farmer."

There was a moment of silence while the expert felt his way through Johnny's bristling hair. Finally the phrenologist began again:

"Ah, young man, here is another and more decided bump. This protuberance denotes want of energy. You should exert yourself to run about, play with other boys, take more exercise, and—"

"Hully gee!" shouted Johnny, wriggling out of the professor's grasp. "Keep off'n that lump. I got it turnin' somersets yesterday and 'tain't gone down yet. See?"

RELIGIOUS.

Sunday Services.

Religious services were held at the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Sunday, December 11th, 1892, commencing at 2 o'clock p. m., President Angus M. Cannon presiding.

The choir sang the hymn beginning:

Lord thou wilt hear me when I pray!
I am forever thine!

Prayer was offered by James C. Woods.

Behold the great Redeemer die,
A broken law to satisfy;

The Priesthood of the Nineteenth ward officiated in the administration of the Sacrament.

ELDER CHARLES W. PENROSE was the speaker. He commenced by reading John 1, 1-14.

This, he said, is a portion of the record left by John, the beloved disciple, one of the Twelve. It is to be supposed that these special witnesses of the Lord were well acquainted with Him—who He was, whence He came and why He came. In this age, men suppose themselves in possession of a great deal more knowledge of divine things than there was in the days of the Lord, but if this were true, it is singular that there is so much contention among men in regard to what is the pure Gospel of Christ. Even today there are eminent preachers on trial for teaching what others consider contrary to the truth, and the judges themselves are divided in their opinions about the cases they are to try. The Apostles certainly knew something definite about these things, and if we understand what they have recorded, we too may obtain definite knowledge.

As to the character of Christ, we have the testimony of those who knew Him best, that He was not only a great teacher, a great exemplar among men, but that He was the Son of God, who came from God and went back to God after His work was finished. John speaks of Him as the "Word" of God, who was in the "beginning."

According to John there is more than one God, startling as this announcement may seem to modern theologians. John certainly in the portion we have read speaks of two distinct persons and says both are God. And in the account of the baptism of Jesus, we are told that the Holy Ghost rested upon Him and a voice said: "This is my beloved Son." Here are three distinct substances, and they are all of the Godhead. In the account given by Moses of the creation we are told God said, "Let us make man after our likeness," which indicates a plurality. All things were made by Him whom John calls the "Word," and further, "In Him was light," so that this person was certainly more than a human being. With this agreed the revelation given by Joseph the Prophet, that the light of the world is through Him. All things are of God and by Jesus, the light and the life of men. Every man who comes into the world has a portion of the light of Christ, which is the Spirit of truth, who comes from God and leads to God, and all might by following its rays be led into the presence of God. But there is also left with man a free agency. And there is an evil influence, as there is a good influence, neither of which is forced upon man.

There is a disposition among people to do away with the idea of a personal God and a personal devil. The tendency of modern thought is to accept a good principle and an evil principle, but it seems only reasonable to suppose that, if there are good and evil principles, there must be persons embodying these principles. We read that Christ after His baptism, was tempted by Satan. And the tempter was not a mere principle, but a person. Jesus argued with him, talking to him.

Jesus is the only begotten of the Father, the express image of Him, and as Jesus is a person, so the Father is. Man was made in the likeness of the Father, but Christ was the express image of Him, because He was the firstborn, the beginning of the creation, the firstborn according to the spirit and the only begotten according to the flesh.

These ideas conveyed in the Scriptures are different from those that have obtained currency in the world, and it is important to the Saints to understand this correctly, for Christ is our mediator, our savior. He came into the world as we have done, borne by a woman. He grew up, lived, suffered and died. And, if these things are not true, religion is merely a myth. If Christ was only a great teacher, the New Testament is not true, and each one may as well make a religion for himself. Jesus claimed that He was with the Father before the world was. He claimed to be the light and the life of the world and sent His disciples to preach salvation in His name. The people of the nineteenth century need to have these truths again proclaimed, that they may not be led away by worldly philosophy.

The speaker mentioned how the world had abandoned the first principles of the Gospel and then testified that the Gospel had been restored again in this age through the Prophet Joseph, to whom the Son of God appeared and revealed the truth, and now in this Church everything is done in the name of the Son.

Christ came to the world in order to give Himself as a sacrifice. He did so voluntarily. Our first parents chose to transgress the law of God, and death was introduced into the world, but as all die through that transgression, life shall come to all mankind through the work of Christ. For in the resurrection all shall rise. He died that all might live. He died that men may be redeemed from their sins. Death, sorrow, sufferings exist in the world as a consequence of the transgression. These experiences came as a curse, but they proved a blessing, for it was necessary that we should have experience of these things. And through the salvation brought by Christ, we have a full redemption from all evils. Through His atonement there is a possibility for all to become saved. The sacrifice of Christ was typified throughout the whole Mosaic dispensation. Everybody can be a partaker of this perfect salvation, if he will only obey the commandments of the Gospel. To repent of our sins and be baptized for the remission of them and receive the Holy Ghost, that is the Gospel as preached by the first Apostles and that is the Gospel as preached in this age by the Saints, and as we have obeyed it, we have received the testimony in our hearts concerning the truth of it. We are here to serve the Lord.

All men will hear the Gospel. Those who have not heard it here in this world, will have the privilege of hearing it hereafter. Millions of persons among both Jew and Gentiles have not heard the name of Jesus, but they shall hear it. Jesus went to preach the Gospel to the spirits in prison, and His followers have done the same, and thus the time shall come when all shall have heard about Jesus and acknowledge that He is the Lord. As to us, it is knowledge that we are in Christ, for so others shall be raised in the first resurrection. "Blessed and holy is he who has part in the first resurrection, for over these the second death has no power, but the rest of the dead lived not until the thousand years should be finished." If we are His when He appears, we shall be raised among the blessed and holy. Jesus shall change our vile bodies and fashion them like unto his glorified body. But in order to obtain this, faith alone is not sufficient, unless it is a living faith, resulting in obedience to God's commandments. The faith that is no more than a confession of belief is not a saving faith. We must be baptized into Christ, not only by water but by the spirit, for we may be one with Christ, united with Him as the branches with the vine. The Gospel has been restored that it shall be preached again to all men, and all may know that Christ is the Son of God, to whom all must look for salvation.

The choir and congregation joined in singing the hymn:

Praise to the man who communed with Jehovah,
Jesus anointed the Prophet and Seer.

Professors Clawson of Richfield and Boyle of Elsinore are trying to get together a concert company to play through Sevier and Sanpete counties in the near future, says the Ephraim Enterprise. They intend to draw upon the talent of both counties and if they get the people they want they will be able to present a programme worthy of the attention of the most official audiences.

Rumors of serious defalcations in the San Francisco postoffice have been rife in the city for several weeks. They culminated yesterday in a general charge that Postmaster Backus had been mulcted in a sum of money ranging from $2,000 to $10,000. This theft was attributed to one of his closest and most trusted employees. It was also asserted that employees were assessed systematically to make good the amount so abstracted.—San Francisco Chronicle.

In Woman's Sphere.

By One of the Sex.

The Art of Sociability.

We have reams of paper covered with directions as to the proper behavior when we rise up and when we sit down, when we eat, when we sleep, when we marry, and even when we die; that is, our friends are told just how to do after we are dead, and there is a strict code of behavior well understood, if unwritten, pertaining to the manners and dress of people at funerals.

You all know the delightful person who bears everywhere the reputation of being sociable. "We all like Mrs. Popular, she is so sociable." No one calls her pretty, nor intellectual, nor do they even mention the fact that she is good; that she it might even be said is sociable seems in some indefinable way to circumscribe every good and admirable quality.

These people who are sociable, however, deserve a little closer study than their friends and acquaintances give them; they are a class in and of themselves, and what has earned them their reputation is worth knowing. At a first glance one might suppose selfishness and sociability were non compatible, but the truth is some of the most sociable people are intensely selfish. Sociable people are always talkative people, whether their talk be sense or nonsense. A certain affectionateness is a part of sociability, but the greatest point in the quality is a love of approbation. If thou art anxious for the good opinion of thy friend, thou wilt hide in a measure thine own selfishness and tickle and please thy friend by a chatty remark or an interested ear turned to his words; if, however, thou art cold to public opinion thou canst never be sociable.

The Sensible Person.

If sociable people are agreeable friends, the most comfortable of all persons to talk with, associate with, and live with, is the sensible person. I have in my mind a middle-aged woman who is the most delightful companion imaginable. She is sociable too, but ah! that is not her greatest charm. She is so sensible. She never takes offense at trifles, rarely at really unkind acts or words. She isn't offended if her next door neighbor has a party and forgets to invite her, nor does she sulk if all her intimates are bidden to the feast while she remains at home. If her children choose to spend more time with others than they do with her, she knows they have a good and sufficient reason therefor, as she gives them the credit of being as sensible as she is. If some rare occurrence should wound her, she buries it deep in her own heart, awaiting an explanation, and if the explanation comes no one needs to go down on their knees in the dust to make reparation. A word is sufficient. She enjoys things quite as well as other people, but if one thing fails her, she can easily turn to another. What a dreadful thing it is to have intimate friendships with sensitive people! You must always call them sensitive people! if you were to call a spade a spade to them nothing less than a spasm or an enemy would be the result. Your words must be watched, your actions guarded, eye even your very looks must be turned in the proper direction. If I were a man, living in the olden days of this Church, I should fervently pray to the Lord to deliver me from getting a sensitive wife or wives. I know a family in which are a number of wives, and although obliged to pass through the separations and trials of recent years, yet they are the happiest family on earth. They, generous souls, attribute their cheerful content to the nobility and wisdom of the head of the house; but I, who am an unprejudiced on-looker, feel that much of their happiness is due to the fact that they are one and all eminently sensible. Can eminent sensible people ever be eminently selfish?

The Ordinance of the Sacrament.

When our fathers and mothers left the old Sæctarian creeds, with their Sunday religions, long faces, and solemn restrictions, they were so enjoined to find that our Father loved cheerfulness and happiness that they inclined to the other extreme and made their meetings together a sort of social reunion. Now this may be well enough before the services begin, but there can be no greater insult offered to a choir which is singing, or to a man who is praying or preaching, than to whisper and shuffle while the service is proceeding. If it is insulting to speaker or singer to whisper, what name would we bestow upon the actions of those who pay little or no attention to the solemn and sacred ordinances of the sacrament. Imagine, if you can, a kneeling group of Israelites before the altar whereon the priest was offering sacrifice, whispering and smiling, chatting and nodding to each other! Think of a group of our good Saints gathered in front of the cross whereon our beloved Savior was hanging in His death agony, bobbing and bowing, whispering and laughing in careless indifference to the awful scene! Do you think our God can be mocked? Think of it, ye mothers who allow your children to run and to play in Sabbath School during this solemn ordinance! Think of it, ye women whose thoughts float lightly and whose careless noise disturbs the sacred spirit of the House of God! Think of it, ye fathers, who handle with careless, abstracted fingers the tokens of that mangled form! Are we not silly children running to and fro in our Savior's presence?

FROM OUR EXCHANGES.

Some Christmas Presents.

A PAIR OF KNITTED SLIPPERS.

Materials—Two skeins of midnight yarn, any shade desired; bone hook, medium size; one pair of lamb's wool soles, one yard of ribbon, one-half yard elastic.

Make a chain of fifteen stitches.

First row.—One double chain in each of the first seven stitches; in the next or centre stitch work three double chains all into one stitch; one double stitch in each of the seven loops. To do double chain, insert hook in stitch, draw yarn through, then through both stitches on hook. Turn and repeat second row until you have thirty ridges or six double rows, counting two rows to a ridge.

Now begin the side of the slipper. Work eighteen double stitches back and forth without any increase. Work fifteen rows, or until the strip is long enough to reach to back of heel. Break off and work the other side to match. Sew together at the heel. Sew to the sole and finish with a row of holes round the top of slipper, with shell edge. Place a pretty bow on the instep. Run the elastic round the top of the slipper so they will sit snugly to the foot.

A LAUNDRY SLATE.

Procure a small transparent slate, remove the pictures from it, and have a piece of stiff paper cut to fit the frame; on the paper can be written or printed in fancy lettering the names of articles of apparel belonging to a gentleman. The frame of the slate may be gilded or painted with some of the many pretty colors of enamel paint now in use, and decorated with a fine spray of flowers; forget-me-nots are pretty. At the top, the words "wash! wash! wash!" or "wash and be clean," may be placed. Remove the back from the slate, and place the paper under the glass, then fasten the back on, which also should be painted. At each end of the top corners place a little screw and ring, such as are used in window shades, and through these rings run a narrow ribbon, putting it through double, with the bow and ends in the centre. On the right side of the frame a tiny lead pencil corresponding in color may be attached to a narrow ribbon. This little article, though quite inexpensive, will be found very useful to a gentleman sending his clothing to the laundry. By placing the figure at the side of each article, no difficulty will be found in remembering how many are sent.

FOUR-IN-HAND SCARF.

Materials, 1½ ounces crochet silk and a No. 2 crochet hook.

First row: chain forty.

Second row: Turn and counting back, do 3 d. c. in fourth stitch of chain, do 4 d. c. in eighth stitch, and continue to end of chain, leaving three stitches between the shells. There should be ten shells.

Third row: Turn chain 3, do 3 d. c. in space between first 2 d. c. of last shell in second row, and 4 d. c. between first two in next and remaining shells.

Fourth and continuous rows same as third. Make this part of the work sixteen inches long.

Then, after turning, chain 3, do, 4 d. c. in space between first 2 d. c. of second shell in last row; do this in each row until there are but three shells.

Make this part of the work eighteen inches long then turn, chain 3, do, 4 d. c. between first 2 d. c. of first shell in preceding row, also 4 d. c. between last 2 d. c. in same shell; do this in each row until there are eight shells. Make this part of the work four inches long. Line neckband with No. 3 ribbon.

THE YOUNG HOUSEWIFE.

If at the first the frying-kettle is hot before you are ready for it, put in a dry crust of bread. It will not burn as long as it has something to do, only when it is left idle.

It is convenient to have an iron-holder attached by a long string to the band of the apron when cooking; it saves burnt fingers or scorched aprons and is always at hand.

A woman who lives in the country where they butcher their own meat says she cannot find out, even from the butcher, in what part of the beef the sweetbread is found. Butchers know this organ as the throat and heart or stomach sweetbreads. In physiology the organs are known as the pancreatic glands, the throat sweetbread being the pancreas, and the heart sweetbread the thymus. The heart sweetbread is much better than the throat, being of good shape, compact and tender, while the throat is long, loosely put together, and inclined to be tough. In the common books on physiology nothing is said in regard to the change that takes place in these organs as the animal matures. I find many butchers who know that there are no tender sweetbreads in the matured animals, but do not know the reason why. These organs are tender and delicate only while the animal is quite young. While the calf is still on a milk diet the sweetbread will be white, plump and tender; but just as soon as the food is changed to grass the organ begins to grow tougher, loses its plump form, and grows darker, until in the full-grown beef it would not be recognized. What is true of beef is also true of mutton. The sweetbread in the lamb is delicate and delicious. One never finds it in this form in the matured sheep.

Steel knives, used at table or for cutting bread, meat or anything for which a sharp knife is needed, should never be used for stirring or cooking anything in hot grease, as it makes them very dull.

Silver in daily use may be kept bright a very long time if always washed in hot suds and rubbed briskly on a soft, dry towel. Silver and glass should both be wiped right out of the suds without rinsing.

Dry salt will remove egg stains from spoons, and gum camphor kept with silver will prevent it from tarnishing. Camphor will also keep away mice, moth and other vermin.

Apologies of dinners, one of the burning questions in society relates to the length of time that hosts should wait for dilaatory guests on such occasions. There are a few people, most of them women, who are notoriously unpunctual, and it is embarrassing to decide whether dinner shall be kept waiting for them or whether it shall be served without their presence. Common sense declares that fifteen minutes' grace is enough to allow for difference in time-pieces and for accidents, and that after that period has elapsed the banquet should go on with those who have arrived, and the others be allowed to come when they choose. A longer delay destroys appetites, is detrimental to the cookery, and where the theater or the opera is to follow, the pleasure of the evening may be spoiled by it.

All good housekeepers know the value of a large-sized apron for use in the kitchen. For some years I have used another and as necessary a part of a kitchen outfit, namely a kitchen sacque, a calico sacque fitted loosely over my dress, that I can put on when I am dressed for the afternoon, if I have to go in the kitchen, as one so often has to do with the "help" we have nowadays. It is buttoned up the front closely to the neck, and the sleeves have bands at the wrists. I find it keeps out the smell of the grease that will saturate a woollen dress when one has to spend any time cooking on the stove or range. This with a large kitchen apron gives me a complete coat of mail, and then when my work is finished I slip off the sacque and apron, and presto! I am dressed again for the parlor or company, with so little trouble. I would not be without the sacque for many times the cost and trouble of making it.

Miscellaneous.

SENDING THE TWIG.

[N. Y. Recorder.]

Tom came home the other evening with a new theory. That was no unusual thing, for he is given to theories, bless him, but this particular theory was startling in its conception and its results. He announced quite resolutely and calmly at the dinner table that punishment of all sorts and conditions was to be out of the family code of governing. There were to be no whippings, no deprivations, no scoldings.

Now never in my life had I raised my hand to offer corporal punishment to Tom, Jr., nor had his father ever used physical force. That youth had been made to feel the weight of our displeasure by forfeiting some pleasure trip, some valued possession or coveted deservet, and even in these instances Tom often made vicarious atonement for the sins of his son. Indeed, I had thought our reign was of the mildest, and this new regime astonished me quite as much as it seemed to tickle the fancy of the heir.

For a couple of weeks everything went beautifully. Tom impressed it upon our boy that he was to be good from a high sense of honor, and to prove him self worthy of the great mark of confidence we placed in him by trying, under all circumstances, to do as nearly what he knew to be right as possible. But alas! this living on a pedestal proved wearisome. Tom is a boy, and a most mischievous one, and the boy nature had to assert itself. Complaints began to come in from the janitor, from the neighbors, from the grocers on the avenue. It was not that Tom meant to be bad, but the new government was too much for him. Like Ireland, he was not ready or able to rule himself, and needed the wholesome restraints of a limited monarchy.

The teacher of his class sent for me to come to school to tell me that within two weeks a change had seemed to come over the spirit of Tom's dreams, and hinted that unless a very marked reform took place it would be better for me to remove him.

What I did was very quickly done. I cleared the moral atmosphere with a thunderstorm. First, I reasoned gently but firmly with Tom, Jr., and required him to bring back a better report the next day. Next day the report read very unsatisfactory. I ordered the culprit to betake himself to the solitude of his own room and think on these things till dinner time. As I left him he pouted. "Papa said I was not to be punished."

I replied that I hoped it would not be necessary to break papa's rule, when the door was violently slammed and a shower of heavy shoes threatened to break it down. Then and there the sweet gray eyes grew black,—I tied together three lithe new whalebones! you may imagine the rest, but there is peace once more at No. 90. Tom lives in love and harmony with the janitor, the neighbors, his teacher and his parents.

GROWTH OF THE HAIR.

The influence of diet upon the growth of hair is the subject of a paper in which the writer says: "Several cases of shedding of hair after influenza has confirmed my opinion that diet has much to do with the cure of sympathetic alopecia. Hair contains 5 per cent of sulphur and its ash 20 per cent of silicon and 10 per cent of iron and manganese.

"Solution of beef (or, rather, part of it), starchy mixtures and even milk, which constitute the diet of patients with influenza and other fevers, cannot supply these elements, and atrophy at the roots and falling out of hair result.

"The color and strength of hair in young mammals is not attained so long as milk is the sole food. As to drugs, iron has prompt influence. The foods which most abundantly contain the above named elements are the various albumenoids and the oat, the ash of that grain yielding 22 per cent of silicon.

"I have often found a dietary largely composed of oatmeal and brown bread to greatly promote the growth of hair, especially when the baldness was preceded by constipation and sluggish capillary circulation. Those races of men who consume most meat are the most hirsute."

Notes.

Rev. Edward E. Hale seconds Miss Willard's nomination of Jean Ingelow for poet-laureate. He says in the Boston Commonwealth: "A queen should have a woman for her laureate. Victoria is to look among the women of England, to know who has written, or who can write, such poems as shall honor a reign, now more than half a century long, which has a literature of its own, as in all other regards it has its own distinctive history. This woman is Jean Ingelow."

To the literary women of the world will be given an opportunity to figure in the two libraries that are being collected for exhibition at the World's Fair. That in the Illinois State clubhouse will contain the writings of Illinois women only. For this many volumes are ready for the bookcases now. Among these are "The Vision of Dante" and "Study of Child Life," by Elizabeth Harrison, and "Out of Darkness Into Light," by Mrs. Dean. The library for the Woman's Building is growing rapidly.

English children are only permitted to eat what is good for growing bodies, and the American mother sending her boys to their schools, stipulates that her darlings shall have extras and sweetmeats, because they cannot live on bread, meat and one vegetable. "They will not stay unless they have what they want," says the average mother, and it is a common cry. "They will have it, so what can I do?" Imagine a small will in conflict with a large one and coming off victor!

The bane of the American discipline is that the mother reproves the child for doing a thing at one time and overlooks it at another, according to the state of her nerves. When she can no longer control herself, she punishes the child. Then she has an uncertain fashion of threatening future punishment, instead of quiet, sure, quick work. Perhaps she confesses her weakness by threatening to tell father, and when she has been known to say in the presence of the culprit, that she "could do nothing with him." Is it any wonder that he gets a contempt for her strength, and a confidence in his own?

Dr. Dudley A. Sargeant's normal training class at the Harvard Annex gymnasium now numbers 25 members. The course has been extended to two years. In connection with this training, courses are given in anatomy, physics and psychology. Several of the pupils are from the South and West. A young woman from Pennsylvania who entered this year has broken all previous records in entrance examinations by lifting one of weight of nearly 500 pounds. One of the former pupils is now the resident physician at the Chicago University; another has charge of the woman's department in the Leland Stanford, Jr. University, and still another has charge of the gymnasium at Bryn Mawr. The new gymnasium at Vassar is run by two of these normal school girls, and the gymnasium at Oberlin is in charge of another. Two graduates of the class have charge of the Berkeley Ladies' Athletic Club in New York.

COLUMBUS.

It is quite impossible, without special study, to comprehend the real grandeur of the courage and genius displayed by Columbus in his discovery of the western continent. He lived in an age of bigotry, superstition and ignorance. Men were afraid of venturing beyond the old land-mark lest they might be swallowed by indescribable monsters or be precipitated off the earth into the bottomless cataracts of the ocean. They had small faith in the earth's roundness and they felt that it was tempting Providence to their own destruction to venture upon the wonderful voyage proposed by Columbus. Rulers heard his schemes, then quietly laid them aside as the chimera of a dreamer. Kept in suspense from year to year, his youth was wasted and the fresh ardor of life well nigh lost. Poverty, obscurity, neglect and contempt were his daily portion. The very school children pointed mockingly at their heads, as he passed them in the streets, implying that something was wrong with him in that region. When, at last, he received a favorable hearing at the court of Spain, it was the warm, enthusiastic soul of a high-minded woman, urged by another of her sex, who gave him credence. Ferdinand looked upon the scheme with coldness and distrust, though believing in it sufficiently to prevent its being laid at the feet of any other sovereign. Isabella, however, enlisted her soul in the enterprise; and when the discovery was ultimately accomplished, she exerted her utmost power for the benefit and protection of the poor, overtaxed, persecuted natives. She endeavored also to fulfil the contract of the crown and to make adequate returns of gratitude to the discoverer who had triumphantly laid the prodigious prize of a new world at the feet of the government, though at the sacrifice of a life's ease and personal comfort.

Columbus had endured every species of neglect and indignity before he at length received the small fleet with which he made his celebrated voyage. When on the seas he found himself surrounded by a menacing, mutinous and really frightened crew. They felt as men who had bade their last farewell to the shores of the living and loved ones and were approaching the terrible yawning cataclysm that were to plunge them upon the shores of eternity. Insolence, insubordination, threats and scowling slander muttered around him and in every corner of his vessel. But he stood there as he had stood before the council at Salamanca before the king and courtiers in the splendid Spanish court and before the lofty eye of Isabella, in the midst of the magnificent triumph at Granada; as he stood among his little knot of humble friends at LaRabida—alone, yet full of innate dignity and commanding power, born of earnest conviction and manly, unselfish zeal for a cause to which he firmly believed himself commissioned of God. He felt himself the appointed instrument through whom the ends of the world were to be brought together, that they might all be brought under the banner of Christ. The chivalry of the Crusades, the ardor of the Cross against the Crescent still lingered in his breast, and burned with the lambent purity of the coming Reformation rather than the lurid flames of the Inquisition, and he beheld in the magnificent realms of India which he was to reach by sailing westward, the means of redeeming the Holy Sepulchre, in which princes and the armies of centuries had failed. To this end he looked with an anxious eye for the wealth of the Orient.

When gladdened by the discovery of land his first act was to kneel and kiss the soil and offer thanksgiving to the Almighty. Rising, he unfurled the banner of Spain and took possession of the land in the name of his sovereigns and the Cross.

His return to Spain and re-appearance at the court remind one of a Roman triumph. In the procession, the gray haired hero lent a dignity, as he rode in the van, that made an impression of pathetic gravity upon the thousands of beholders who crowded the very roofs of the houses to catch a sight of the wonderful genius, now mad-man, adventurer, upstart, parasite, no longer! The sovereigns received him, standing, in a pavilion raised specially for the occasion and having listened with breathless attention to his wonderful story, knelt unanimously with the assembled multitudes while thanksgivings and te deums were chanted by the choir. This was a day of royal favor and universal praise of Columbus. The tidings were soon carried from one country to another by traders, caravans and travelers. In almost every country mass and rejoicings were celebrating the name of him whose towering genius and almost unprecedented perseverance had shed so great a blessing and glory upon the world.

His days of fame and happiness were of short duration. His companions in the second voyage consisted largely of cavaliers, adventurers and hidalgos. Gold was their object in the new lands, but not the gold that comes of honest labor. Disappointed and embittered at not finding it in ready nuggets to their hands, they returned to Spain and infused a spirit of depreciation in their friends. They were replaced by outlaws and mendicants; criminals and to the general scum of Spanish society were to form the subjects of the Governor and the germ of the future colony. The outcome was natural; rebellion, defiance of law and authority, idleness, licentiousness, demoralization. The suggestions given to the sovereigns by Columbus were full of sagacity and wisdom; the orders he gave for the government of the island were full of judgment and civil leadership, but who could lead a body of ignorant, besotted out-laws and retain a reputation for statesmanship? Intriguers at court whose envy could not brook the favors showered upon a stranger, intriguers at the colony whose deftness colored their obstreperousness with apparent justice; ignorance, avarice, idleness, licentiousness, ingratitude, envy the material he had to mold—surely Columbus was glad to rest! It stands Spaniards in hand to endeavor to throw off their own ingratitude by accusing Columbus of inefficiency in government. Let Americans or the world challenge Emilio Castelar to disprove our counter charges of Spanish perfidy, intrigue and ingratitude!

Envy and ingratitude destroyed Columbus in this world but he had "builted better than he knew." Phoenix like his name has arisen from the ashes to which it was consigned by envious detractors and is to day honored as but few have been. He was sent to Spain in chains; he was maligned and robbed and his children were despoiled; he died alone in poverty and afflicted, but to day his name shines with unrivaled lustre, while the great ones of his generation are well nigh forgotten. While we proudly see his name grow brighter and brighter, we also note that those of his malicious persecutors grow darker and darker in the midnight of oblivion and ignominy. Columbus was a hero. Let him reap a just reward of well earned gratitude and world-wide admiration for his noble deeds. May his heroism be preserved to our nation, untouched, uninjured by he poisoned shafts of small, envious souls who would rob humanity of every moment that stands upon a pedestal higher than themselves! We can but detest, with Chauncey M. Depew, "that spirit of incredulous inquiry which doubts everything and destroys all likeness of heroes which has been the inspiration of heroism, through all these centuries. It is this spirit that would destroy our Columbus." With what pride and gratitude we see that the effort has not been successful and that to day the world gives honor and gratitude and glory where they are due!

RUBY LAMONT.

CIRCLEVILLE, Utah Nov. 30th, 1892.

From letters received by Collector Quinn from interior counties it is apparent that the Chinese are gradually becoming reconciled to the registration proposition, says the San Francisco Chronicle. Many applications have reached the collector and all indicate a general disregard for the dictates of the Six companies. The only obstacle, the collector believes, to a general willingness to register is the necessity of having photographs taken. This necessarily causes delay, and the Chinese are not kindly disposed toward that feature of the registration. The Chinese in the city still continue obdurate and their persistent refusal to register indicates adherence to the orders of the six companies.

CITY COUNCIL.

The City Council met in regular session last night, President Leobonrow in the chair. The councilmen in attendance were: Robt. Folland, Hardy, Horn, Bell, Kelly, Simondt, Evans, Beardsley, Karriok, Wentland, Moran, Lawson.—18. Absent—None.

The minutes of the previous session were read, amended and approved, after which the transaction of regular business was commenced.

The Proceedings.

W. Longmore and others sent in a complaint regarding the change of sidewalk grade on the south side of First South street.

ELECTRIC LIGHTS.

The board of education sent in a petition asking for the erection of electric lights at the intersection of Eighth South and Eighth East streets; Second South and Seventh West; First West and Peach streets; Fifth South street, between Third and Fourth West street; on First North, between Sixth and Seventh West streets. Committee on improvements.

J. Vanmeter asked that an electric light be placed at the intersection of Land and Fourth or Fifth streets. Committee on improvements.

TO BUY LAND.

Louis Hobeln asked to purchase a certain tract of land in City Creek canyon belonging to the city. Committee on public grounds.

CITY SEALER OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mayor Baekin sent in a communication in which he announced the appointment of J. R. Montgomery as city sealer of weights and measures. Confirmed.

WANTS RELIEF FROM FEES.

The board of education asked to be relieved from the payment of building permit fees. Board of public works.

TOO POOR TO PAY.

Miriam Clark sent in a petition in which she represented that she was absolutely without means to pay her city taxes and asked for relief. Committee on ways and means.

DANGER REMOTE.

The city engineer reported in the matter of the petition of James Hogle and others asking that a temporary grade be established on the west side of Fourth East street between South Temple and First South streets, that he was unable to see how the outcrops and fills referred to could affect the property unless the work of graduation was actually extended. The necessity for bringing the street to the official grade is so remote that it was not likely to effect present improvements. Adopted.

WATCHING THE WORK.

The same official returned the petition of Mulloy and Paul relative to constructing their own curbs and sidewalks which had been granted, and stated that he was keeping his eye on the work. Board of public works.

CONSULTING ENGINEER.

The same official reported that in pursuance of instructions to him with reference to the employment of a consulting engineer upon the plan of our proposed gravity sewer, that he had telegraphed Mr. Edward P. North, of New York City, who is an engineer of acknowledged ability and integrity, asking if he could come and at what cost to the city. In an answer he wires that he has written in full. Upon the receipt of his letter he would make a further report to the council. Received and filed.

HELP-ASKED FOR.

The city recorder asked permission in behalf of himself and the city treasurer to engage the services of help to take charge of the work of special assessments after January 1st, 1893. He suggested that Mr. Hiller be employed at a salary of $125 per month. Committee on finance.

PENDLETON'S REPORT.

The water commissioner sent in the following report which was referred to the committee on waterworks:

I hereby submit a report of my labors in connection with Parley's canyon from October 4th until date. First I opened up spring in Lamb's canyon. In the right hand fork cleared out four springs and placed weirs below, and the increase was 200,300 gallons in twenty-four hours. In the left hand fork of Lamb's opened seventeen springs, and the weir placed in the creek showed an increase of 200,300 gallons in twenty-four hours, this including two springs at the head of the canyon which measured 56,200 gallons. This is a natural reservoir where a large quantity of water could be stored at a small expense. All of the above springs have been numbered and staked, and their location will be found on a map of Parley's canyon which I will submit when completed. In connection with this work have cleaned the stream in the left hand fork for a distance of two miles, and the accumulation of rubbish burned. Have also opened springs at Peter's Canyon on the ranch on the summit and caused an increase of 21,000. On Youngberg's ranch opened spring No. 1 and increased 12,900 gallons in twenty-four hours, and spring No. 2 increased 69,900 gallons. This includes a seepage from the mountains above the weir, making the total of water developed 500,400 gallons in twenty-four hours. In the main canyon have cleaned and strengthened the creek, and in places where it was practicable have turned it away from obnoxious corrals, and where the creek ran close to the road turned it back to its original channel away from the drainage of the road. Credit is due Watermaster W. H. Ryan for the prompt and able manner in which he helped me in this work. I have placed a number of signs in the canyon notifying stockmen in regard to be fouling the waters of said stream. There has been driven through the canyon amounting to 1,000 head of sheep. There have been no large herds allowed nearer than seven miles from the reservoir. I have been looking over a route from Emigration canyon over to Big Mountain, then down East canyon, thus avoiding Parley's. This route could be made at small expense to the city and country and all interested. This matter should be looked into this winter before the return of the herds in the spring. I am collecting evidence in regard to the land and water rights of the city in all places where they are interested, which I will submit to the city attorney.

Rich—I want to know who authorized Mr. Pendleton to spend the city's means beyond the city limits. Our Mayor, it will be remembered, recently held that we could not spend money outside of the city limits.

Kelly—He was employed by the city and this report comes in response to myself requesting him to keep a public record of what he has been doing.

Hardy—It seems that there is a little misapprehension as to whom this water really belongs. In regard to how this city obtained a right to the Parley canyon water, I will say that according to its contract with the original owners—Sugar House residents—if the city should shut off the water in the Jordan canal, then the residents of Sugar House ward can shut off 82½ per cent., which is the city's proportion. If the city develops the springs in Parley's canyon they are doing it for the benefit of the original owners as well as for the city.

Folland (sarcastically)—I am glad to hear that someone has suggested that Mr. Pendleton should keep a record, as it is reported that last summer he spent $19,000 to $20,000 of the city's money without keeping any record of the same.

PURCHASE OF SEWER PIPE.

Superintendent of Sewers Shelton reported that the construction of four blocks of sewer main had been advertised and that it would be necessary to purchase pipe for the same immediately. Referred to the Mayor and committee on sewerage.

RAILROAD AND VIADUCT.

The city attorney in a lengthy document opined that the Rio Grande Western Railway company could be compelled to build a viaduct across their tracks—sixteen in number—at the intersection of Second South and Sixth West streets, in accordance with petition of William Nelson and others. Committee on streets.

LEGAL COUNSEL EMPLOYED.

The same official reported that in the matter of the employment of assistant counsel in the case of Smith et al. vs. Salt Lake City which was referred to the Mayor, president of the council and himself, that they had employed the firm of Bennett, Marshall and Bradley for the sum of $750, and Judge Leobonrow at the sum of $500. Adopted.

WORK OF THE CREMATORY.

Beardsley, chairman of the sanitary committee, reported:

Gentlemen—Therewith submit for your consideration a statement showing the amount of work performed by the Engle Crematory, size No. 4, during the month of November, 1892. Said statement will also show the amount of fuel and labor used in operating said crematory:

The following was completely destroyed by the crematory:

Cable yards of garbage and refuse (mixed)	870
Cable yards of tannery clippings	35
Cable yards of manure	36
Etc.	2450
Barrels of swill (40 gallons per barrel)	291
Barrels of night soil (40 gallons per barrel)	145
Dead cats	32
Dead cows and calves	5
Dead dogs	108
Dead horses	23
Miscellaneous animals	1

Cost of operating said crematory:

Two furnacemen—11 days at $2.50	$55 00
Three furnacemen—15 days at $2.50	$35 00
One laborer—29 days at $2.00	$58 00

Total amount paid for labor $148 00

Fuel used—26 tons Rock Springs coal at $5.25..... 147 00

Total cost of operating cremator for November..... $396 50

I estimate that the amount of garbage, manure, swill, night soil, dead animals, etc., mentioned above, is equal to 1436 cubic yards. The actual cost of destroying same being $396.50, making the actual cost per cubic yard 27 5-8 cents.

In connection with this report I will say that the cremator is, in my judgment, a complete success. It destroyed everything placed therein. No offensive odors have been detected during the time said cremator has been in operation. From an economical standpoint, I deem it eminently superior to the old system, namely, that of bedding all garbage and dead animals from the city by rail. I estimate the actual amount saved per month at about $765.50.

In conclusion I will state that November being the first month the cremator has been in operation, and the men in charge of furnace inexperienced, an unusual amount of fuel was used, which, I am pleased to state, will be obviated in the future.

THIRD AND L STREETS.

The committee on improvements reported, recommending that an electric light be placed at the intersection of Third and L streets. Adopted.

AFTER THE SANITARY INSPECTORS.

Rich moved that the sanitary inspectors employed by the city be discharged.

Beardsley said the men were not employed and had not been during the present term.

Moran wanted to know what, if anything, these inspectors had been doing. Receiving no reply he took his seat as ignorant on the question as when he arose.

Folland stated that when the inspectors were employed it was distinctly understood that their services would not be required for more than thirty days. He thought they should be discharged until spring, and at once.

Simond's moved to refer the matter to the health commissioner for a report as to whether the inspectors should be retained.

Bell said he, too, was in favor of the dismissal of the men. They should have completed the work in twenty-five days.

Hardy stated that the men were daily drawing pay from the city and it should be stopped.

Evans offered a resolution providing for the dismissal of the inspectors until further order of the council.

The chair ruled the matter out of order.

Rich wanted to know if the records would show the length of time these men were employed. If it was thirty days he opposed to paying them for sixty or ninety or any other number of days.

Simond's substitute was then defeated.

Rich's motion to discharge the inspectors then carried.

THE CREMATORY PAID FOR.

Beardsley offered the following:

Whereas, The garbage crematory built by the Eagle Crematory company was put in operation on November 2nd, 1892, and has been in constant use since that time and seems to fill all the requirements as per contract; therefore be it

Resolved, That the crematory be accepted by the City Council and the contract price of the same of $12,000 be placed on the appropriation list.

Rich offered a substitute to the effect that $12,000, less the amount paid out for the construction of platforms and approaches, be placed on the appropriation list. Adopted.

PURCHASE OF WATERMAINS.

Wantland moved that the Mayor and committee on waterworks be authorized to purchase the 800 feet of 16-inch water pipe necessary to complete the extension of watermains on First South street. Carried.

UNDERGROUND WIRE SYSTEMS.

Hardy offered the following, which was referred to the committee on improvement:

Whereas, The wires of the Electric Light company and the Telephone company are getting so numerous and dangerous on business streets, and

Whereas, The storms of winter are now coming on and wires are liable to break almost at any time and damage to property is liable to occur; therefore be it

Resolved, That the above named companies are hereby notified at once to prepare and commence the construction of placing all wires under ground on the streets that are paved and those streets in the paving district.

The City Council held an adjourned session last night. In the absence of President Loofbourrow Councilman Simond's was called to the chair. The members in attendance were: Rich, Folland, Karrick, Horn, Bell, Lawson, Kelly, Evans, Beardsley, Hells, Wantland, Moran, Absent—Hardy.

More than half an hour of rapid reading was required to get through the minutes of the previous meeting. After they were adopted President Loofbourrow entered and the chair was for him.

The Proceedings.

Lawson took the floor and moved that business be taken up where it was discontinued at the time of adjournment, and after some discussion the motion prevailed.

SEWER ORDINANCE.

An ordinance levying an assessment of $3 per linear or front foot on property on the north side of First South street from Fifth East to the east side of Eighth East street and on the east side of Eighth East street to the south line of South Temple street in sewer district No. 4, was passed under a suspension of the rules and referred to the mayor for his approval.

ASSESSMENT OF PROPERTY.

An ordinance prescribing the manner of the assessment of property and for the collection of taxes was similarly passed.

VAULT CONSTRUCTION.

Health Commissioner Beatty, according to instructions, submitted an ordinance regulating the construction of privy vaults was read the first time, and after a good deal of drudgery discussion, referred to the committee on sanitary rules and regulations.

SEWER ORDINANCE AMENDMENTS.

Amendments were made to the sewer ordinance as follows:

A water closet, bath tub and wash basin may all be ventilated through the same pipe, but in all such cases the two-inch vent pipe which is common to such fixtures, shall not exceed five feet in length unless special permission in writing is first obtained from the city engineer, and the same rule shall apply to cases where a water closet and where a bath tub or a wash basin are vented through the same pipe.

Double hubs are prohibited in all cast iron soil and water pipes.

Wooden wash-trays and wooden sinks are prohibited inside of buildings; such fixtures shall in all cases be of non-absorbent material.

Except in pipes which are vertical the use of sanitary "T's" is prohibited.

BUILDING OF BONFIRES.

An ordinance prohibiting the building of bonfires on streets paved with asphalt was passed and embodied in the compilation.

THIRD READING FINISHED.

The revision of the ordinances was finished on a vote of 13 to 1, Moran alone voting in the negative.

SIMOND'S SUGGESTIONS.

Simond's said just as the ordinances were on their last reading that he had some suggestions to make, but did not know how to state them. He, however, wanted to know whether or not the Mayor could read the ordinances and return them in five days to the Council.

Moran (sarcastically):—Don't you think that he can do so in five days if the Council overcome that work in sixty days?

MOONLIGHT MATTERS.

The appropriation bill which was defeated at Tuesday night's meeting then came up and a motion was made to take out the bill of the Salt Lake Power Light and Heating company amounting to nearly $3000, and refer it back to the company for correction and deduction.

Rich, speaking to the question, said that the city had been poorly lighted and he thought the Council was in good position to fight the company, but he found on investigation that the Council preceding this one on the last night of its term had renewed the contract for street lighting until February, 1895.

Folland said he did not think there was anything wrong with the contract or the moonlight scheme, but the fault was in the non-enforcement of its provisions.

Moran said he had never heard any complaints regarding the services of the company. A good deal of debate followed on the Philadelphia moon schedule and was finally cut off by the motion being defeated.

THE GRAVITY SEWER SYSTEM.

City engineer sent in a communication in which he stated: In the matter of employing an expert engineer for consultation regarding the proposed gravity sewer I beg leave to further report upon the subject I have received a second telegram from Mr. Nuth saying he cannot come.

Before communicating with anyone else I thought it best to represent to you that men of the class we desire are not generally able to respond upon short notice because of other similar engagements, and to secure the services of a first-class man we may have to wait several months. In the mean time the season for active work will have arrived and none of the necessary preliminaries will have been attended to. In view of this I have thought that some other course than the present one of consultation, might be acceptable to the Council and accordingly suggest that a number of our local engineers might be asked to act in connection with a committee of the City Council and myself as a consultation board on the adoption of my general plan of consultation and disposal. This could be done at once and in time to prevent any delay in starting the work.

I have devoted a great deal of time to the study of this question which I regard as the most important one with which we have to deal and do not hesitate to promise the most satisfactory results should the proposed plans be carried out. And while I feel that any further delay in starting this important work will be a mistake, I do not wish to urge its being done before the Council shall have obtained all the information which may be thought necessary to confirm my assurance in the matter asking such further instruction as you may think best.

In answer to questions Mr. Doremus stated that he was satisfied in his own mind beyond a question of doubt that the gravity system on which he reported some time ago was a feasible one.

In connection with Mr. Doremus' report Karrick offered the following which was adopted:

Resolved, That the city engineer be authorized to employ the necessary help and immediately commence the preliminary work and survey of the gravity sewer and report to the Council.

ORDERED TO CONTINUE.

On motion of Wantland the city engineer was ordered to continue his work of negotiating with expert engineers with a view to securing their ideas and services on the gravity sewer system survey.

APPROACHES AND PLATFORM.

The Mayor and chairman of the sanitary committee sent in a communication in which they stated that it was their understanding that the city should pay for the approaches and platforms for the crematory and consequently the Engle Crematory Company should be paid the remaining $500 on the contract. So ordered.

THE BOARD OF EDUCATION.

The regular weekly meeting of the city school board was held last night. Vice-President Nelson occupied the chair. The members present were Young, Raybould, Ald, Pratt, Newman, Pike and Duke.

JANITORIAL MATTERS.

Several communications referring to janitorial applications and raise of salary were referred to the committee on furniture and supplies.

WANT A MALE TEACHER.

George R. Jones, and two others asked that the school patrons in Folsom's addition be given a male teacher in place of Miss Briggs who is now teaching at that place.

ELECTION EXPENSES.

The New West Education commission sent in a bill for $10 for the use of the Burlington school building on election day. Committee on finance.

WANTS TO KNOW WHY.

The following communication was read by the clerk:

Colonel William Nelson, Chairman Board of Education:

Dear Sir—At your next regular meeting will you be kind enough to present to your honorable body the enclosed recommendation, which our superintendent, Mr. Millsbaugh, sent to me? My object in sending this is to ascertain the exact reason why I was so summarily dropped without the knowledge of the teachers' committee, after being notified by the chairman, Mr. Duke. I have since learned from excellent authority that Mr. Work received the information which I now write: "If I recommend you I shall need to let out a man of another denomination." (Baptist myself.) Now, Colonel, what I wish to know is why was not I recommended to teach at the beginning of the school year? Thank you and your honorable body for the favors shown during the past two years. I have no doubt but that you will make a thorough investigation of this matter, so that justice may be shown me.

Yours respectfully, R. C. WATT.

Subjoined to the above communication was the following from Dr. Millsbaugh, which was referred to the committee on teachers to make prompt investigation:

To Whom It May Concern:

This is to say that Mr. R. C. Watt has been principal of School No. 3 in this city for the past two years. Changes in our buildings, by which a consolidation of schools is effected, have led to his release. Mr. Watt is a man of normal training, industrious, painstaking and conscientious in his work. His character is above reproach. I earnestly ask for him the thoughtful consideration of school boards who need male teachers or principals.

COVERED VESTIBULE.

The committee on sites and buildings reported that they had instructed the superintendent of buildings to construct a covered vestibule on the west side of the Twelfth school building; also two brick retaining walls and steps to the basement, so that the latter can be used for class rooms. They reported that the total cost of the said work was $118, and asked that their action be approved and the amount appropriated. Adopted.

BOOK PURCHASE RECOMMENDED.

The committee on school work reported as follows:

The books purchased for use of the schools are in case of a few subjects exhausted. This is due to an increased attendance, greater than was anticipated. We, however, would probably get along with the books already purchased, but for the recent increase in the number of pupils in the addition to the city of the new district. These pupils were instructed by their teachers not to provide themselves with books. We have therefore to furnish all that are needed. We recommend the purchase of the following: One hundred copies Slickney's first reader; 100 copies Slickney's second reader; 100 copies Slickney's third reader; 100 copies Franklin fourth reader; 50 copies "Tales of the Grandfather;" 50 copies of "The Two Great Retreats;" 300 copies Modern spellers.

We recommend that the Barnes Geographies now here, be purchased, but that the American-made books be informed that we do not hold ourselves bound to continue to use that geography in our schools for five years.

The report was amended to read, "but that the purchase shall not be construed as an acceptance under the contract," and was then adopted.

HEI PULLED THROUGH.

About the saddest thing I ever encountered was a pathetic little incident on the battle-field after the siege of Atlanta, says a correspondent of the St. Louis Globe Democrat. It was night, and I had been ordered to go out and work on a casement near the enemy's lines. They knew we were there, for they kept up a continuous ping, ping, ping of minie balls, now and then varying the amusement by sending a hot ten-pounder, scorching the ground and playing havoc with the bushes unpleasantly close to our ears. As I was running about, suddenly one of our boys rushed up and said: "There's a man dying wants to see you, captain. You'd better come quick, for he's got a hole through his head." I hastened in the direction he indicated and soon found the poor fellow. He was being propped up by a corporal, but by the way he acted and talked I knew he was settled for.

"They've got me this time, captain," he said slowly, the blood choking him as he spoke.

He had been wounded a couple of times before, and was a brave man and a good one, too. I said what I could in the line of sympathy, telling him that it was the fate of war, and that all his old comrades would follow him sooner or later. It was only a matter of a few days any how.

"I want you to do me a favor, captain," he said, the death sweat on his forehead shining like beads in the fitful gleam of a candle he had lighted.

"Of course I'll do it, my boy," I said.

"There's my knapsack and canteen;" he choked pitifully, "take them or send them to my poor old father and mother up in Vermont. Tell 'em that their only son died like a soldier on the field of battle. Tell them that I died thinking of them; and—and—there's another matter, another—"

Here a stream of blood gushed from his lips, and his eyes took on a look of horror that almost frightened me.

"Another matter," he gasped, "another matter. Reach down in my blouse and get a picture that is there." I did as directed, and saw in the faint light that the card bore the face of a young woman. "It's—it's the girl I was going to marry!" sobbed the dying man. "Tell her that—that I died with my lips on hers! Put the picture to my lips, captain, that I may—may kiss it!"

He kissed the senseless card board over and over again, and though I turned my face reverently away I caught a glimpse of the loveliest eyes that told his devotion. As he caressed the likeness for the last time the ambulance drove up and he was tenderly loaded in for the hospital, where his last moments might be at any rate a little less painful than on the rough rockstrewn battle ground.

The first chance I got I sent that knapsack and that sweet face to the ones who loved the soldier. That isn't all of the story. In October, if I recollect aright, just before the battle of Altoona, and after General Hood swung round to Grant's rear, I was riding along a very dusty road with my company. Suddenly I saw a spectacle before me that nearly knocked me off my horse. There, in the middle of the road, with his arms wildly waving toward me, was that same dying soldier. His head was banded up, and when he spoke his voice was much impeded.

"I've got a furlough," he said trying to grin, good-naturedly, but failing because of the bandages round his face. "I've got a furlough and I'm going home to marry that girl." And he died.

RODE OVER NIAGARA ON BLON-DIN'S BACK.

[N. Y. Mail and Express.]

When Blondin, the rope-walker, carried a man on his shoulders on a wire rope stretched over Niagara Falls in 1859, he achieved instant and lasting fame. His courage and daring are praised to the skies even now, but the nerve of the man who made the trip on the Frenchman's shoulders has of late years excited no particular comment. After the lapse of a generation this man has been found in Chicago, where he has told the story of his great ride.

His name is Henry M. Colcord. He was a professional athlete in 1859 and was a fellow member of the Ravel troupe with Blondin. When he made his first trip over Niagara Colcord was 26 years old. When the troupe disbanded Blondin proposed to Colcord that he should cap all his previous feats by going to the Falls and making the ascension—that is what the profession called the long rope walk.

"Blondin's ambition was," said Mr. Colcord, "to go across the falls and not across the river. His idea was to anchor one end of the rope at Goat Island, with the old Terrapin Tower, long since removed, as the support on the American side, and then to extend the rope across Horseshoe Falls, through the mist to Table Rock, where it would be securely anchored on the Canadian side.

"Mr. Porter was the owner of the land and he would not give his consent. We worked a whole year to get the rope fixed in that way, but failed in the end. Finally we put the rope about half way between the old bridge and Niagara Falls, across White's pleasure grounds. There it was that we made our first ascension.

"The guy ropes were not protected when we made our first crossing. The people had access to them, and as there were large sums of money staked on the outcome, the temptation to pull these ropes by those betting against Blondin was very great. In the middle of the rope there was a space of forty feet not supported by guy lines. I had to dismount three times from Blondin's shoulders and stand on the rope with my hands touching on his shoulders before we reached this spot. This rope was strung 275 feet over the river and was 1,900 feet in length, and neither of us knew the action of that forty feet without the guy lines. Blondin had crossed the river before, but not with any weight. It was the man on his back that gave the affair its great import. Blondin said to me: 'Harry, whatever I do in crossing that forty feet, don't you do anything. Sit perfectly passive on my back. Just be dead.' Don't try to balance while I am walking on that space."

"When Blondin had walked over ten feet of that forty with me on his back he suddenly lost his balance. He could not recover it. He started to run on one side of the rope clear to the first guy line, a distance of thirty feet. No sooner did his foot touch the guy line than it broke, and he had to run to the next one, another twenty feet. When he got there he caught his balance and said to me, 'Get off quick!' I dismounted and stood there quietly with my hands lightly touching his shoulders until he got ready to go on.

"Now here's the meaning of Blondin's hurry: He had not got half way across the rope before he was aware that somebody was pulling the guy line. He didn't say one word to me about it, for if he had, as sure as I am alive to-day, I should have been scared to death. This incident shows his coolness.

"He expected that every guy line he would pass would be pulled in this way, and that he would lose his balance every time he reached one of these lines. I never dreamed that under the circumstances any man could be guilty of such a dastardly act as that. Before we reached the shore I dismounted seven times, and it took us thirty-five minutes to get across.

"The first season Blondin did not get much. He depended largely upon contributions. But then, afterward he took my advice, and the last two seasons he made $400,000."

Mr. Colcord has been painting portraits since 1863, and now, at 59 years of age, he has a quiet studio in Chicago.

He came to America in 1861, and remained in Missouri and Illinois until 1866, when with his wife and three children he started for Salt Lake. Another child was born on the road, and two died, as well as his wife, within one month; both children were buried in one grave. He was married a second time in 1867 or '68, and a third time in 1869 to Jane Jenkins of Tooleton, who survives him. The third wife bore him eleven children, nine of whom are left to mourn his loss. In 1867 he went with the volunteers of Salt Lake to meet Johnston's army as far as Echo canyon, and was one of those who escorted the survivors (Cummins) to the city. The year 1868 was a trying one for him, as his wife's father, Elder Stewart, lost all his cattle, and with his family suffered many hardships. He has done such work for his ancestors in the Temple at St. George as he has lived and died in full faith in the Gospel.
